

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2022 with funding from Kahle/Austin Foundation

BRITISH DRAMA

By the Same Author

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE THEATRE

MASKS, MIMES, AND MIRACLES

STUART MASQUES AND THE RENAISSANCE STAGE

THE THEORY OF DRAMA

READINGS FROM BRITISH DRAMA

FILM AND THEATRE

409

Sheila Donald.

DESIGN FOR A THEATRE
OPEN TO THE AIR, THE SUN, AND MOON

BRITISH DRAMA

AN HISTORICAL SURVEY FROM THE BEGINNINGS TO THE PRESENT TIME

BY

ALLARDYCE NICOLL

PROFESSOR OF ENGLISH LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE IN THE UNIVERSITY OF BIRMINGHAM

FORMERLY PROFESSOR OF THE HISTORY OF DRAMA AND DRAMATIC CRITICISM AND CHAIRMAN OF THE DEPARTMENT OF DRAMA YALE UNIVERSITY

FOURTH EDITION REVISED

GEORGE G. HARRAP AND CO. LTD.

LONDON

TORONTO

BOMBAY

SYDNEY

First published September 1925
by GEORGE G. HARRAP & CO. LTD.
182 High Holborn, London, W.C.1
in association with B.U.E. Ltd.

Second Edition published July 1927
Third Edition published July 1932
Reprinted: November 1944; July 1945
Fourth Edition published December 1947
Reprinted February 1949
Copyright. All rights reserved

THIS REPRINT IS IN CONFORMITY WITH THE AUTHORIZED ECONOMY STANDARDS

Made in Great Britain. Printed by Jarrold & Sons, Limited, Norwich

PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION

THIS book could not be, and is not intended to be, exhaustive. It attempts to trace the history of our theatre from its most primitive origins in the Middle Ages to the present day, and for this purpose it deals rather with tendencies than with individuals. Genius has constantly been forging new weapons for the theatre to wield, but in essence the theatre has remained one and the same. The tragic passion of Æschylus is the tragic passion of Shakespeare even as it is the tragic passion of Ibsen. The mirth of Euripides springs from the same fount as the mirth of Jonson or of Synge. All through the ages the terror and the awe and the laughter have been the same, minor variations only being made to accord with the spirit of changing generations. This being so, my aim has been to deal with the main manifestations of our English theatre rather than to write a series of brief criticisms of particular writers and of their works. No apology is made for the inclusion or the exclusion of any individual dramas, save that I have endeavoured to take as examples those plays which seem to me most expressive of the tendencies here discussed. I am aware that there are many tragedies and many comedies, both Elizabethan and modern, which may appear to deserve greater attention than others to which I have devoted considerable space. On the other hand, it is often the lesser work which gives us the surest clues to the general tone of an age. Shakespeare's tragedies are not truly typical of the Elizabethan and Jacobean periods because of Shakespeare's greatness. If we would seek for those broader currents which flow silently and deeply from age to age we must search out Shakespeare's lesser companions and from their work divine the chief movements of which they form only a part.

BRITISH DRAMA

As the drama can never be disconnected from the play-house itself, each division of this brief survey is prefaced by a sketch of the theatres and the audiences of the period treated in the following pages. I have emphasized sufficiently here and elsewhere my belief that no true understanding of the drama of any age is possible without some formulated conception of the spectators for whom the particular plays were written and of the theatres in which they were intended to be produced. Regarding the drama as inseparable from the theatre, I have dealt but slightly with that remarkable activity in poetic play-writing which extended from 1795 to the end of the nineteenth century. Wordsworth, Shelley, Coleridge, and the rest were great poets, but for the most part they were poor dramatists, and even Byron declared that he wrote most of his dramas for the closet rather than the stage. They can claim, therefore, no more than scant attention in a work which is intended as an outline of English dramatic, and theatrically dramatic, literature.

In planning this work I have allowed full space to the modern dramatists, not only because the drama of our own day deserves our attention, but because of the belief that in the present-day theatre we have a revival of dramatic interest comparable only with that of the Elizabethan period. No age between the beginning of the seventeenth century and the end of the nineteenth century can show such a galaxy of great creative writers as our own age possesses. Tragedy and comedy alike have been revitalized, and we may look forward to a still fuller and even more artistic development of this newly awakened art in succeeding decades. To deal satisfactorily with living writers is always a difficult task, but I have attempted, as far as lay in my power, to test the works of to-day by the masterpieces of the past. It may be that there are some mistaken judgments, but so far as such a personal art as criticism can be objective I have endeavoured to make it so. The treatment of these modern dramatists is largely historical; an effort to estimate in wider terms the main creative forces in the theatre of to-day and to express some more vi

PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION

deeply held critical beliefs has been reserved for the final chapter, which sums up data presented earlier in the book.

It is my opinion that only through a wide survey can a true appreciation be gained of what the English theatre stands for. Only by watching its slow development in the Middle Ages, its flower-time which was Shakespeare, its decay in the Augustan period, its winter's sleep in the early nineteenth century, and its sending forth of new shoots in our times, can we realize the noble stock which it is our duty to tend and to nourish with our deepest care and attention. Art is international, the drama one of its chiefest modes of expression; yet the English theatre, besides being a heritage of humanity, is a national heritage which it behoves us to know and to add to, that it may not become merely a tradition of the past, but rather may embody a genuinely creative spirit in our midst.

I wish to express my sincerest gratitude and thanks to Mr Harold H. Child for the great help and for the many suggestions he has given me during the reading of the proofs of this volume. I have to thank also His Grace the Duke of Devonshire for permission to reproduce some copyright designs in his possession; the Librarian of Chatsworth for his courtesy in procuring this permission and for other assistance; Mr Bache Matthews and Mr Paul Shelving for allowing the reproduction of the latter's design for Kaiser's Gas; and Mr Huntley Carter for furnishing the original photograph of Meierhold's theatre. The Chatsworth designs are from photographs taken at the Victoria and Albert Museum. Mr Gordon Craig, besides many other courtesies and helpful aids, for which I am deeply grateful, has kindly given permission to use as the frontispiece his design for an open-air theatre from The Theatre Advancing, the photographure plate being lent by Messrs Constable and Co., Ltd.

A. N.

June 1925

PREFACE TO THE THIRD EDITION

IN preparing the present edition of this book I have entirely rewritten the final sections dealing with the development of English drama from the end of the nineteenth century to the present day. Dramatic affairs have moved rapidly during the past ten years, and, apart from the necessity of including notice of many plays produced or published since 1923, a fresh orientation toward the whole movement in the modern theatre seemed called for.

Maybe I have adopted here an over-optimistic attitude. In these days when our newspapers, with one auspicious and one dropping eye, regularly announce to us the withdrawal of plays after theatrical careers more brief than Gertrude's widowhood, when, too, the managers complain loudly of their inability to secure dramas worthy of representation, it might certainly be argued that we are on the verge of a decline similar to that experienced in seventeenth-century England after Shakespeare and his fellows sank into silence. Prognostication in literary matters is, of course, a difficult and a hazardous task, but I still feel that, in spite of the present critical state of the theatres, the English drama of to-day is manifesting a creative spirit which tells that the life-force of Edwardian days has not yet been suffocated. That our stage is timorous and unadventuresome cannot be denied, but sufficient remains to prove that we are not entirely content to rest on laurels won by our predecessors. Nor is this critical state of the theatre confined to England alone; on the Continent and in America there are kindred fears and kindred pessimism.

Commonly the cinema is blamed for the theatre's present parlous state, but, as I have striven to indicate, condemnation of the film seems to be but a suicidal process. The theatre is one of the greatest instruments of intellectual entertainment possessed by mankind; and now, within the space of a few years, there has been developed a cognate art-form, closely associated with the stage and yet distinct from it—an art-form, too, which in a peculiarly effective manner reflects the existing conditions, desires, and aspirations of the present day. For the theatre to condemn uncritically this novel type of expression simply as a type of expression will be a procedure fatally unwise, and to declare that the cinema must always remain within a sphere of inartistic imbecility must betray only an ignorance of or an insensibility to what already has here been accomplished. An art-form that has produced the magnificently pathetic humour of Charlie Chaplin's The Gold Rush or the marvellously imaginative fancies of Walt Disney presents a force which in its positive achievement demands sympathetic appreciation and critical esteem. Mere imitation of those spectacular effects in which the film can revel is, however, equally fatal. Occasionally it may be good business; sometimes, as in Sir Oswald Stoll's production of Erik Charell's Casanova at the Coliseum, it will present something of rich and genuine beauty; but fundamentally it is effort misplaced. The film will always be able to beat the stage at this particular game.

BRITISH DRAMA

The hope of future advance in the theatre, it seems to me, must come from a better-informed and more consciously critical appreciation of all that the new art of the cinema has introduced to our audiences. If the theatre is to live it must compete with the cinema, but compete not as the awkward clown in the circus with the professional strong man, but as the painter competes with the musician, the sculptor with the painter, each recognizing his special province and refusing to strain his legitimate means to secure ends alien to the spirit of his art. For this applies to both sides. So long as English film-producers unimaginatively endeavour to reproduce realistically the scenes of those stage-plays they avidly seize on for their 'talkies,' these producers would appear to be treading a path as absurd and as artistically barren as that essayed by theatrical managers who, to counter the claims of the cinema, trade merely in colourful show and spectacle. Recognition on the part of the one and of the other of the limitations imposed on them by their art-form and of the demands made by that art-form—this is the supreme necessity.

PREFACE TO THE THIRD EDITION

For these reasons, and because there are indications that such a recognition is being approached, I have expressed myself in the later chapters of this book more optimistically than perhaps the existing facts would warrant. It may be that I am mistaken. It may be that the English dramatists, through their disinclination to experiment as boldly as others have done, are lagging, and will continue to lag, behind. It may be, even, that the novel art of the cinema will oust the old art of the stage. But, whatever the immediate future may bring, it must be a backward and unimaginative mind which insists, while clinging desperately to what is the familiar and the accustomed, on neglecting or on condemning consciously artistic efforts deliberately aimed at the evolution of new means of expression—means adequate to reveal the more complex and the more subtle conditions of a world grown strangely feverish and curious.

A. N.

June 1932

PREFACE TO THE FOURTH EDITION

AN attempt has been made, in this fourth edition, to bring the account of the British stage up to date by including the work of those dramatists who have been active in the thirties and forties of the present century.

These years, although broken by the War, have not been without considerable theatrical interest. During this time Mr James Bridie has achieved an established position, Mr Priestley has turned from novels to plays, Mr Emlyn Williams and Mr Keith Winter have applied themselves to the drama—above all, Mr T. S. Eliot, followed by Mr W. H. Auden and others, has boldly attempted to set the poetic play on a fresh, and a surer, foundation. Perhaps, when theatre historians in after time look back on our era, they will note as its most characteristic development this new approach toward an imaginative drama, with the determined effort to find a speech medium at once likely to appeal to modern ears and harmonious with the current styles in non-dramatic verse.

If this be so, then the qualified optimism expressed (in 1932) in the preface to the third edition of this volume finds justification. Before the thirties only Dr Gordon Bottomley and Lascelles Abercrombie were seriously endeavouring to rebuild the poetic stage; now their pioneer efforts are being followed by many younger writers, and the path they laboriously trod is being smoothed out. It is, of course, impossible to say what effect the War will have had upon this dramatic roadway that was so clearly shaping itself in the thirties, but there seems to be no reason for expressing, in the year 1946, any less optimistic a hope than that expressed in 1932. For such optimism there now exists much more positive justification than there did then.

A. N.

December 1946

CONTENTS

PART I

THE BEGINNINGS TO SHAKESPEARE

CHAPTER	PAGE
I. INTRODUCTORY. THE DRAMA OF GREECE AND ROME	13
II. THE GROWTH OF NATIVE DRAMA	20
(i) Tropes and Liturgical Plays, p. 20
(ii) The Mysteries and Miracle Plays, p. 24
III. THE DEVELOPMENT OF PROFESSIONAL DRAMA	41
(i) The Morality Plays, p. 41
(ii) From Symbolism to Realism. The Interludes and Court Plays, p. 48
(iii) Early Tragi-comedies, p. 52
(iv) The Development of True Comedy, p. 57
(v) Senecan Tragedies and Chronicle History Plays, p. 60
IV. THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE PUBLIC THEATRES. THE UNIVERSITY WITS	66
(i) The Theatre in the Late Sixteenth Century, p. 66
(ii) The University Wits; Lodge, Nashe, and Peele, p. 73
(iii) Marlowe, p. 78
(iv) Kyd, p. 86
(v) Greene, p. 88
(vi) Lyly, p. 91
(vii) Other Dramatists of the Late Sixteenth Cen- tury, p. 94

PART II

THE ELIZABETHAN, JACOBEAN, AND CAROLINE DRAMA

I. CHARACTERISTICS OF THE PERIOD. THE AUDIENCES AND THE THEATRES	101
(i) Historical Survey, p. 101
(ii) The Theatre, p. 106

BRITISH DRAMA

CHAPTER

PAGE

(iii) The Reflection of Contemporary Conditions in the Drama, p. 110
(iv) The Main Types of Drama, 1600-42, p. 119
II. ROMANTIC COMEDY AND ROMANTIC TRAGI-COMEDY	122
(i) The Romantic Comedy of Shakespeare, p. 122
(ii) The Romantic Tragi-comedy of Beaumont and Fletcher, p. 131
(iii) The Influence of Beaumont and Fletcher on Shakespeare, p. 135
(iv) The Development of Romantic Drama, p. 137
(v) Pastoral Plays, p. 144
III. REALISTIC COMEDY AND SATIRICAL PLAYS	146
(i) Shakespeare and Jonson, p. 146
(ii) Chapman and Dekker, p. 154
(iii) Later Realistic Comedy, p. 159
IV. SHAKESPEARIAN TRAGEDY	169
V. THE REVENGE PLAY	180
VI. THE HORROR TRAGEDY	188
VII. THE DOMESTIC DRAMA	197
VIII. THE CHRONICLE HISTORY	205
IX. THE MASQUE	210

PART III

RESTORATION DRAMA

I. THE SOCIAL AND THEATRICAL ENVIRONMENT. DRAMA DURING THE COMMONWEALTH	215
(i) Drama under the Puritans, p. 215
(ii) The Restoration Theatre, p. 218
II. THE HEROIC TRAGEDY AND THE RETURN TO SHAKESPEARE	223
(i) Love and Honour Drama, p. 223
(ii) Blank-verse Tragedy, p. 233
(iii) Opera and Spectacle, p. 238
III. COMEDY IN RESTORATION TIMES	242
(i) Comedies of Humours and of Intrigue, p. 242
(ii) The Comedy of Manners, p. 250

CONTENTS

PART IV

DRAMA IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

CHAPTER	PAGE
I. CHARACTERISTICS OF THE AUDIENCE	259
II. PSEUDO-CLASSIC AND PATHETIC TRAGEDY	263
III. THE BALLAD-OPERA AND PANTOMIME	269
IV. THE DECAY OF TRUE COMEDY AND THE GROWTH OF SENTIMENTALISM	279
(i) The Sentimental Movement, p. 279
(ii) The Older Tradition in Goldsmith and Sheridan, p. 289
V. THE DOMESTIC TRAGEDY	296

PART V

DRAMA IN THE EARLY NINETEENTH CENTURY

I. THE MAIN TENDENCIES OF THE TIME	301
II. THE LITERARY DRAMA	307
III. MELODRAMAS AND FARCES	323

PART VI

THE BEGINNINGS OF DRAMATIC REVIVAL (1860-90)

I. CHANGE OF THEATRE, AUDIENCE, AND TONE ; IBSEN	334
(i) Theatrical Conditions, p. 334
(ii) Henrik Ibsen and other Continental Dramatists, p. 338
II. T. W. ROBERTSON AND THE DOMESTIC DRAMA	347
III. GILBERT AND SULLIVAN	353

BRITISH DRAMA

PART VII

THE REVIVAL IN THE THEATRE (1890-1920)

CHAPTER	PAGE
I. MAIN TENDENCIES	356
II. DOMESTIC TRAGEDY AND PROBLEM PLAY	362
(i) Sir A.W. Pinero and Henry Arthur Jones, p. 362
(ii) John Galsworthy, p. 367
(iii) Harley Granville-Barker, p. 372
(iv) John Masefield, p. 376
(v) St John Hankin and others, p. 379
(vi) St John Ervine, p. 386
(vii) Irish Dramatists, p. 391
III. THE POETIC AND IMAGINATIVE DRAMA	400
(i) Verse Drama, p. 400
(ii) J. M. Synge and the Irish School of Imaginative Dramatists, p. 410
(iii) Sir James Barrie, p. 421
IV. THE REVIVAL OF COMEDY AND THE THEATRE OF G. B. SHAW	425
(i) Wilde and the Comedy of Manners, p. 425
(ii) J. M. Synge and the Irish School, p. 432
(iii) George Bernard Shaw, p. 435

PART VIII

THE MODERN DRAMA (1920-46)

I. THE FORCES OF REVOLT	446
II. GENERAL CONDITIONS	451
III. THE RELICS OF REALISM AND SIGNS OF CHANGE	456
(i) George Bernard Shaw, p. 456
(ii) The Continuance of Realism, p. 458
IV. THE COMEDY OF MANNERS	467
V. THE POETIC DRAMA	472
Gordon Bottomley, Lascelles Abercrombie, Eliot, and Auden, p. 473
VI. THE 'EXPRESSIONISTIC' SCHOOL	483
VII. PLAYS HISTORICAL AND IMAGINATIVE	488
Clifford Bax and James Bridie, p. 491
BIBLIOGRAPHY	499
(I) Notes on Critical Works, p. 499
(II) Selected List of Plays by Minor Writers, p. 507
INDEX	513

ILLUSTRATIONS

	PAGE
DESIGN FOR A THEATRE OPEN TO THE AIR, THE SUN, AND MOON	Frontispiece
From Gordon Craig's The Theatre Advancing (1921), by permission of the author and Messrs Constable and Co., Ltd. This gives an excellent idea of the style of Mr Craig's designs, while it is symbolic, at the same time, of one sphere at least of modern theatrical endeavour.
MEDIEVAL PAGEANTS	22
From a Bodleian manuscript. These designs were discovered and commented upon by J. J. Jusserand (Furnivall Miscellany). They show a stage with curtained lower room and roof, highly reminiscent of the modern Punch and Judy show.
THE BANKSIDE, SOUTHWARK	23
This map of London shows old St Paul's and old London Bridge. In the foreground is the Bankside, with four theatres, the Swan, Hope, Rose, and Globe.
THE SWAN THEATRE	152
The de Witt drawing of the Swan theatre is the only definite contemporary pictorial evidence of the appearance of an Elizabethan theatre. The drawing was made by a foreign visitor to London and recopied. There is good reason for believing that, while it shows some of the main features of the Elizabethan stage, it is erroneous in several details.
TWO ELIZABETHAN STAGES	153
The right-hand design is an enlarged portion of the frontispiece to William Alabaster's Roxana (1632); the left-hand design similarly reproduces part of the frontispiece to N. Richards' Messalina (1640). The two stages may not be of the 'public' type. They should be compared carefully with the drawing of the Swan theatre.
PROSCENIUM ARCH AND SCENE I FOR "THE QUEENE OF ARRAGON"	184
This sketch was prepared by Inigo Jones for a production in 1639 of William Habington's The Queen of Arragon given at the Cockpit or Phoenix in Drury Lane. It shows well the way in which the scenic decorations of the masque were introduced to the 'public' stages.

SEVENTEENTH-CENTURY STAGE

This design of a theatre with multiple scenery was first noted by Dr William Martin. It is contained in the Orbis Sensualium Pictus of Johan Amos Commenius (or Komensky) as translated by Charles Hoole (1658). While it shows a type of scenic arrangement not common in seventeenth-century England, it possesses some features which link it with the other designs shown opposite pp. 68, 70, and 216. The following description of the print is given in the 1658 edition :

" In a Play-house 1 (which is trimmed with Hangings 2 and covered with Curtains 3) Comedies, and Tragedies are acted, wherein memorable things are represented ; as here the History of the Prodigal Son 4 and his Father 5 by whom he is entertained, being returned home. The Players act being in disguise ; the Fool 6 maketh jests. The chief of the Spectators sit in the Gallery 7, the common sort stand on the ground 8 and clap their hands if any thing pleases them."

DESIGN BY INIGO JONES FOR " NEPTUNE'S TRIUMPH "

248

This is typical of Jones's designs for Court masques, and shows well his use of side-wings and his effort after architectural effect secured by means of perspective.

" RED BULL " STAGE

249

From Francis Kirkman's Wits (1673). The stage shown is probably that used by players in the Commonwealth period, the Wits being a collection of 'drolls.' Although the print has long been called the " Red Bull theatre " there is good reason for believing that it does not represent that playhouse. It may be a slightly fanciful representation of the Cockpit in Drury Lane.

DESIGN BY JOHN WEBB FOR ORRERY'S " MUSTAPHA "

280

This design, made in 1665, is for a production of the Mustapha of Roger Boyle, Earl of Orrery.

SCENE IN SETTLE'S " THE EMPRESS OF MOROCCO "

281

This shows the interior of Dorset Garden theatre in 1673. Note should be taken of the ornate proscenium arch, and the apron stage, as well as of the mixture of costumes.

SCENE IN ADDISON'S " CATO "

440

From the 1713 duodecimo edition. The design is interesting as showing the peculiar blend of contemporary and Roman dress. This conventionalism in costume lasted till the third quarter of the eighteenth century.

ILLUSTRATIONS

A WATER MELODRAMA AT SADLER'S WELLS

PAGE

441

From the first decades of the eighteenth century until well on in the nineteenth various theatres, such as that at Sadler's Wells, specialized in pantomimic, and later in melodramatic, displays. Sadler's Wells was particularly noted for its water scenes.

DESIGN BY PAUL SHELVEING FOR KAISER'S "GAS"

472

A setting for Georg Kaiser's Gas, as produced at the Birmingham Repertory Theatre in November 1923. This is a striking example of the conventional scenery of modern times, a reaction against the realistic scenery of former years.

SCENE IN MEIERHOLD'S THEATRE, MOSCOW

473

From Huntley Carter's The New Theatre and Cinema of Soviet Russia (Chapman and Dodd). The scene is from Suchovo-Kobylin's Tarelkin's Death, and shows the symbolic adaptable scenery used in the theatre. The setting represents a prison cell.

NOTE

IN the text of this book the titles of plays are quoted in the original form and spelling on first mention, and, with the exception of some early plays, are thereafter modernized. In the index all titles are modernized for ease of reference.

BRITISH DRAMA

PART I

FROM THE BEGINNINGS TO SHAKESPEARE

CHAPTER I

INTRODUCTORY. THE DRAMA OF GREECE AND ROME

THE mimetic instinct is confined to no single nation ; it is universal in its appeal, and reveals itself as one of the most primitive of human emotions. The desire of men and women to garb themselves in the semblance of attendants upon a god, even to take upon themselves the god-form in its august majesty ; the desire to re-enact the sacred stories, whether they be of Grecian deities or of Jehovah and Christ ; the later desire of the peasant to place himself, if but for a fleeting moment, in the position of a courtier, or of the courtier to forget for a time the intrigues and the cares of his state in a fondly imagined Arcady—all of these are but manifestations of the one primeval passion which reveals itself in church liturgy, in folk-mummings, and in masquerades, no less than in the tragedies of Æschylus and of Shakespeare. This universal nature of acting and of drama renders a study of the stage at once more fascinating and more difficult than the study of almost any other type of literature. It demands, in the first place, a careful investigation of religious ritual and of folk-customs, and, in the second, an equally careful investigation of the literatures of diverse races. No account of English drama can possibly be complete unless reference be made to the services of the early Church, to the relics of pagan ceremonials preserved in a half-fossilized form among the peasantry, and to the development of dramatic art in Greece, in Rome, in France, in Spain, in Germany, and in the Scandinavian countries.

BRITISH DRAMA

The fact that the passion for the drama is thus universal necessitates a further introductory remark. It makes the theatre one of the most traditional and, at the same time, most subtly symbolic of all literary media. There are far greater breaks to be found in the development of lyric and narrative poetry than there are to be discovered in the development of the drama. At the same time, drama continually advances to meet the needs of a particular age ; and our task is, therefore, to trace at one and the same moment the relationship between the plays of one period and another, and to indicate the gradual lines of progression governing the whole world of the theatre. Thus, for example, the romantic tragi-comedy made popular in the early seventeenth century by Beaumont and Fletcher is, when examined closely, seen to be largely a development of the Shakespearian romantic comedy of the late sixteenth century. The one is bound intimately with the other ; yet the spirit of As You Like It is removed, as by centuries, from the spirit of A King and No King. The one breathes to us the atmosphere of Elizabeth's Court, peopled with Drakes and Raleighs ; the other tells of the vitiated tone of an enervated Cavalier society. The traditionalism and progressive nature of drama, this interrelation between the dramatic literatures of various races, this primitive emotion out of which all acting and ' feigning ' spring, will, as far as is possible in the space of this volume, be kept duly in mind.

It is fitting, perhaps, that a start should be made with the drama of classical Greece and Rome, although, in all considerations of the history of English tragedy and comedy, it must be borne in mind that the mediæval mysteries which later developed into the full florescence of Elizabethan drama were indigenous to the soil, that the direct influence of Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides is not visible till centuries had elapsed, and that even Seneca's tragedies did not come to take their place in the elaboration of the English drama till the sixteenth century. In Greece, as in most lands, both comedy and tragedy took their rise from religious ceremonial. The wine-flushed devotees of Dionysus, arraying themselves in symbolic garments, led the way toward the satyric comedy; the more stately worshippers at the altars of majestic gods showed men the possibilities of tragic emotion. It is not easy, because of the lack of extant texts, to study the rise and progress of Greek comedy; but, happily, there are several master-pieces of the greater tragic dramatists which can convey to us both the grandeur of their efforts and the slow progressive movement which extends from the non-dramatic choral chants to the liberated dramas of Euripides. The course of Greek drama, as far as it is known, may briefly be outlined. From a common chant the ceremonial song developed into a primitive duologue between a leader, dressed probably in the robes of the god, and the chorus. The song became elaborated; it developed narrative elements, and soon reached a stage in which the duologue told in primitive wise some story of the deity. Further forward movements were introduced. Two leaders instead of one made their appearance. The chorus gradually sank into the background, no longer taking the place of a protagonist; it became, with Sophocles, merely an 'ideal spectator,' and then, with Euripides, simply a medium for the introduction of lyrical and musical passages often unrelated to the general action of the tragedy. Had there been any great successor to the three outstanding Greek dramatists tragedy must have inevitably taken on other forms. The chorus would have disappeared, and a more modern type of drama would have been evolved.

THE DRAMA OF GREECE AND ROME

It is not necessary here to enter into the details of Greek dramatic activity, but a few notes on the main characteristics of that activity may be relevant, principally such as display the inherent differences between the Athenian stage and the modern.

In the first place, the plays were always regarded as part of a vast religious ceremonial. The audience was filled with a sense of the awe and majesty befitting the occasion, and, as a consequence, only a certain august tone could be allowed in the development of action and of dialogue. The plots, moreover, were, because of this, stereotyped. Only a very limited number of themes were permitted to the dramatists, so that construction, characterization, and language counted for far more than they could do in the Elizabethan period, when a novel tale, an exciting episode, or an adventurous scene might hold children from play and old men from the chimney-corner.

BRITISH DRAMA

The playhouses were the vast amphitheatres of which shattered relics are still preserved on the outskirts of Athens and elsewhere. These tremendous circles of stone were capable of seating thousands of spectators, the aristocrats and the humbler citizens meeting together for the one purpose of witnessing the tragedy enacted before them. As a consequence, the Greek drama is statuesque; it allows of no violent movement; the dialogue is stately and majestic rather than racy and free. The coturnus, the megaphone masks, the inevitable necessity for slow action, kept the plays within bounds which never could confine the Elizabethans. At the same time, the heterogeneous audience, composed of many classes and varieties of men, gave to the Greek drama a certain tone which it shares with the drama of Elizabethan times. There is a healthiness of atmosphere, a breadth of passion, a universality of appeal, alien to the more aristocratic and narrower playhouses of the reigns of Charles I and of Charles II.

This drama of Greece proved the model for the Roman tragedy. Unfortunately, few specimens of Latin serious plays have come down to us. We have records of a number of writers famous in their day, but only the tragedies of Seneca have been preserved in anything like a complete state. The Senecan dramas were unquestionably closet plays not intended for presentation in the theatre. They show clearly the influence of Euripides, and show, moreover, the weakening of the tragic spirit. They are melodramatic, lacking in majesty of tone, immersed in horrors and physical torments. They tell of an age less great, less manly, less noble than that of Periclean Athens. It is the Senecan drama, however, which exercised most influence upon the English, partly because of those very melodramatic elements, partly because Latin had been more treasured than Greek during the long era which we know as the Dark and Middle Ages. Alongside of Seneca we have the comedies of Terence and of Plautus, themselves far-off descendants of the satiric comedies of Aristophanes. Aristophanes himself had brought comedy to the height of perfection in Athenian times, but his plays, by reason of their local and topical touches, failed to find direct imitators elsewhere. The Aristophanic satiric type, on the other hand, developed naturally into the New Comedy of Greece, and it was this New Comedy which Terence and Plautus adapted or endeavoured to imitate. The plays of Terence were obviously written for a small and aristocratic audience. They are witty, alert, cleverly constructed, but they lack breadth and they lack nobility. Because of their style they were never lost. All through the so-called Dark Ages they preserved their place in monastery and in convent. Along with Virgil, Terence takes his stand as one of the chief missionaries of classical culture amid the surrounding grotesqueries of the Gothic imagination.

THE DRAMA OF GREECE AND ROME

No better evidence could be found of Terence's influence in an age when drama seems completely dead than the plays of Hrotswitha, a tenth-century nun who wrote a series of dramas at Gandersheim in Saxony. "There are many Catholics," she says in her preface,¹

And we cannot entirely acquit ourselves of the charge, who, attracted by the polished elegance of the style of pagan writers, prefer their works to the holy Scriptures. There are others who, although they are deeply attached to the sacred writings and have no liking for most pagan productions, make an exception in favour of the works of Terence, and, fascinated by the charm of the manner, risk being corrupted by the wickedness of the matter. Wherefore I, the strong voice of Gandersheim,² have not hesitated to imitate in my writings a poet whose works are so widely read.

¹ The quotations from the works of Hrotswitha are given from Christopher St John's rendering in the "Medieval Library" (1923). The earliest edition of the original plays (all written in Latin) is that by Konrad Celtes, published at Nürnberg in 1501. The standard modern text is that given by Charles Magnin in Le Théâtre de Roswitha.

² The name Hrotswitha seems to mean 'strong voice'; the Latin reads "ego, clamor validus Gandersheimensis."

BRITISH DRAMA

Hrotswitha's plays are all on religious themes: Gallicanus treats of the chastity of Constance in the reign of the Emperor Constantine; Dulcitius of the martyrdom of Agape, Chionia, and Irena; Callimachus of the resurrection of Drusiana and Callimachus; Paphnutius of the conversion of Thais; Abraham of the repentance of Mary; Sapientia of the martyrdom of Faith, Hope, and Charity in the time of Hadrian. In tone they owe nothing to the Latin poet, although the comic figure of Dulcitius is well managed; but in style they display quite clearly that the profession of imitation in the preface was not without foundation.

There may have been other Latin dramas similar to those of Hrotswitha; but all record of them has perished. The further influence of Terence is not visible until we reach the age of humanism in the sixteenth century; but we must never forget that his works, for others besides Hrotswitha, were set apart from the rest of the relics of paganism, and that others risked infection from the matter for the sake of the manner.¹

It is just possible that a further influence on the English and Continental drama came from Rome. During the age of decadence theatrical exhibitions in the Empire tended toward spectacle, buffoonery, and farce. The histriones descended from the heights to provide mere horseplay for the spectators. Crude as such efforts must have been, they were still largely mimetic in character, and it is hard to believe that even in the ages which succeeded the wild incursions of the Goths, the Huns, and the Vandals some sort of Roman histrionic forms was not preserved. There is, it is true, scarcely a record of such, but it is highly unlikely that any account of wandering histriones should have been set down for us in an age when parchment was kept for more serious affairs. A parallel instance may serve to make this clear. In 1642 the play-houses were closed by order of the Puritan authorities.

¹ The play called Χριστὸς Πάσχων, which was attributed to St Gregory Nazianzene (fourth century), has lately been proved to be a tenth-century work (see the edition of J. G. Brambs, Leipzig, 1885). It displays interesting reminiscences of Greek drama.

THE DRAMA OF GREECE AND ROME

They were not opened again until 1660. It was long thought that, with the exception of D'Avenant's operas, performed in 1656 and 1658, this period of eighteen years was an entire blank for the theatre. Minute investigation into the newspapers and documents of the time, however, is proving that audiences were fairly well catered for by itinerant actors, playing sometimes regular dramas, sometimes mere 'drolls' or farces. Taking into consideration the meagreness of our knowledge of medieval life, it does not seem to be an unreasonable suggestion that relics of Roman comedy were carried on by successive generations of minstrels, acrobats, and jongleurs up to the time when the mysteries and the miracles began to make their first appearance. Whatever truth may lie in this suggestion, however, the fact remains that of regular drama of any sort there was absolutely none during the period which intervened between the fall of the Roman Empire and the rise of the mysteries. There may have been, among the country folk, reminiscences of ancient pagan ritual in the form of crude interludes such as have been preserved even down to the present day; but these remnants of the heathen beliefs of past times were fossilized and incapable of further creative progression.¹ Memories of Terence, relics of a debased and long-forgotten Roman farce, folk-plays of a rough and inartistic sort, may all have played their part in the development of early English drama; but this English drama, in spite of any impressions made from those sources, is as indigenous as the drama of Greece, springing from the living faith of the people, written for the people, and acted by the people.

¹ The question of the influence of 'folk-drama' on the religious plays of the Middle Ages and on comedy of the sixteenth century is an important one; but because of its complexity it has been omitted here. The sword-dance with the various ritual performances at village-festivals certainly contributed to the development of later drama. The scope of this influence is well outlined by H. H. Child in The Cambridge History of English Literature, vol. v, Chapter II, and has been exhaustively dealt with in Sir E. K. Chambers' The Mediæval Stage.

CHAPTER II

THE GROWTH OF NATIVE DRAMA

TROPES AND LITURGICAL PLAYS

THE indigenous dramatic activity referred to in the preceding chapter took its rise, as did the drama of the Greeks, from the religion of the time. Whatever it borrowed from other sources it was in origin, and remained for long, distinctively a creation of the Church. The Church was everything for the Middle Ages. Corruption among the clergy may have been rife, but here, after all, was rest for the weary, solace for the afflicted, bread for the hungry, succour for the oppressed ; here was not only the church, but the school, the meeting-place, the centre of art and, still more important, of amusement. The religion of the Middle Ages was a broad religion. It was serious and mystical, but it allowed of laughter. Beside the real bishop stood the boy bishop with his riotous crowd of hilarious attendants. The Church was ready and eager to provide for the people all the delight as well as the spiritual uplifting which it could by means of art and letters. Moreover, it was ready to show to an uneducated folk the Scriptural story in visible wise, thus counteracting the lack of vernacular versions of the Holy Writ.

The very Mass itself is an effort in this direction. The whole of this service with its accompanying ritual is a symbolic representation of the most arresting episodes in the life of Christ, and it is but natural that the clergy should have attempted to make it even more outwardly symbolic as the knowledge of Latin among the ordinary people passed farther and farther into the background. More especially they must have seen the necessity, on the great feast-days of Christmas and of Easter, of bringing before the congregation the salient facts of the New Testament story.

Throughout the early centuries of the Catholic Church

THE GROWTH OF NATIVE DRAMA

gradual movements are to be discerned, all tending in the same direction. Their history has been traced by many scholars, and need not detain us here. Suffice it to notice that by the ninth century tropes, or additional texts to the ecclesiastical music, were being supplied by various writers, and that these tropes frequently assumed a dialogue and hence a dramatic form. Originally they were portions of the Mass service itself as elaborated for the celebration of Easter and other feasts. Of them all the most important is the so-called Quem Quæritis, a slight dramatization of the coming of the three Marys to the tomb of Christ.

Quem quæritis in sepulchro, [o] Christicolæ?

chants one of the choir, personating the angel.

Iesum Nazarenum crucifixum, o cælicolæ, answer others, to which comes the reply :

Non est hic, surrexit sicut prædixerat.

Ite, nuntiate quia surrexit de sepulchro.¹

Very soon, as was indeed inevitable, these tropes became detached from the regular service; they were presented by themselves, and came to associate with themselves an accompanying dramatic ritual. The most instructive document concerning this development is that contained in the Concordia Regularis, a series of rules devised by Ethelwold, Bishop of Winchester, for the use of the Benedictines in the tenth century. It shows clearly that the drama as such had almost come into being. Ethelwold's instructions are as follows :²

Dum tertia recitatur lectio, quatuor fratres induant se, quorum unus alba indutus ac si ad aliud agendum ingrediatur atque

¹ The text is quoted from Sir E. K. Chambers, The Mediæval Stage, ii, 9, who gives it from the St Gall MS. 484, f. 11. The translation runs as follows :

"Whom do you seek in the sepulchre, O Christians ? "

"Jesus of Nazareth who was crucified, O heavenly ones."

"He is not here ; He has risen even as He said before.

Go ; proclaim He has risen from the grave."

² The following translation is by Sir E. K. Chambers (op. cit., ii, 14-15) :
"While the third lesson is being chanted, let four brethren vest themselves. Let one of these, vested in an alb, enter as though to take part in the

THE BANKSIDE, SOUTHWARK

The four theatres, indicated by flags, are the Swan, Hope, Rose, and Globe.

THE GROWTH OF NATIVE DRAMA

Thus was the drama born, not certainly as a distinctively English growth (for the same movement toward the elaboration of church ritual is to be traced in all the Catholic countries from the west of Europe to the east), yet at the same time in England as elsewhere a form of art springing fundamentally from the lives of the people. The various stages through which this primitive drama moved before it reached the stage of the miracle or mystery play would take too much space to detail here. Its history may be read in Sir E. K. Chambers' two fascinating volumes on The Mediæval Stage. The first step, naturally, was the gradual development of the dialogue and the action into little Latin playlets, a step marked by several extant manuscripts in France. The second was the introduction of the vernacular into the midst of the Latin verse. Here we have the invaluable testimony of the works of Hilarius, a scholar of Abelard and himself, it is said, an Englishman. His plays have no great intrinsic value, but they are of immense importance, because in some of them, as, for example, the Suscitatio Lazari, fragments of French verse intrude into the Latin text. The drama is slowly moving toward the people. The third step is the composition of purely vernacular plays acted still within the church. Of these only fragmentary examples of English workmanship have been preserved, although there are extant in French a Sponsus, telling the story of the wise and the foolish virgins, and a still more important Adam, which contains some exceedingly interesting stage directions. All of these were written apparently for performance within the church or cathedral, and the actors presumably were the monks, the priests, and the choir-boys in the service of the church.

It is obvious that, so long as the drama remained in these circumstances, little further progress could be hoped for. The subject-matter of the plays was stereotyped, and the treatment of that subject-matter was largely determined by religious associations. To advance beyond this stage the essential requirement was that the drama should become secularized.

(ii) THE MYSTERIES AND MIRACLE PLAYS

This secularization of the drama came into being fundamentally because of the circumstances of production. Lacking other means of amusing themselves, the medieval folk naturally crowded in to see these shows at Easter and Christmas ; so that, within a short period, the churches were found to be quite inadequate for accommodating the tumultuous bands of men and women intent on witnessing the various plays. The obvious solution was to carry the performances outside into the spaces surrounding the church itself. This change of locality, added to the introduction of the vernacular, marked the clear break-away of the primitive drama from that of which it originally formed a part—the service of the Mass. Unquestionably the rulers of the Church saw the danger lying ahead of them, and they attempted in various ways to stem the tide, not realizing that the drama by this time had become a force with which even they could not contend. Instructions were issued forbidding the clergy to act in the churches ; numerous complaints were voiced in the literary works of the time. The conscience of the superior orders was aroused, and Robert Mannyng in his Handlyng Synne, a free adaptation of the Anglo-Norman Manuel des Pechiez, was no doubt summarizing a good deal of contemporary opinion when he declared that

Hyt ys forbode hym, yn the decre,
 Myracles for to make or se ;
 For myracles, 3yf thou begynne,
 Hyt ys a gaderyng, a syghte of synne.
 He may yn þe cherche þurgh þys resun
 Pley þe resurrecyun . . .
 3uf þou do hyt in weyys or grenys,
 A syghte of synne truly hyt semys.¹

¹ "It is forbidden him by decree to make or witness miracle plays, because miracle plays, once they are begun, become gatherings and sights of sin. The clerk for this reason may act the Resurrection within the church . . . but if it be done on the roads or the village greens, verily it develops into a sight of sin." Both acting of plays by the clergy and the performance of sacred subjects outside the church were opposed at various times.

THE GROWTH OF NATIVE DRAMA

The result of this prohibition was distinctly not that which was desired; it merely threw the drama into the hands of those people among whom it was to flourish luxuriantly. The town guilds took over the representation of the plays and carried on the tradition to the sixteenth century.

The miracle plays, or mysteries,¹ which grew out of the early liturgical drama came to fruition in the fourteenth century. Their popularity was conditioned largely by the Corpus Christi festival decreed by Pope Urban IV in 1264 and made fully operative by the Council of Vienne in 1311. On this day, the Thursday after Trinity Sunday, those plays which before had remained heterogeneous and disconnected were bound together into more or less formal cycles dealing with the chief incidents in the Old and the New Testaments and hence revealing to the eager crowd the whole story of the world from the creation of Adam to the resurrection of Christ.

A true appreciation of these plays, or series of plays, can be obtained only when some attention has been paid to the audience and to the method of presentation. The Cornish plays may here be put aside, as the round amphitheatres of stone, relics of which are still to be seen in Cornwall, were purely exceptional; the great cycles of miracle plays now extant were certainly played in no such theatres. When the liturgical drama was still in close connexion with the church no doubt some raised platforms were employed to lift the actors above the throng surrounding them. With the elaboration of the cycles of plays such stationary platforms must have become rather cumbersome and inadequate for the performance of the various dramas, so that by the fourteenth century we find the normal 'theatre' is a pageant run on wheels and taken bodily to different 'stations' throughout the town. These pageants, as a contemporary informs us, were in the shape of "a highe place made like a howse with ij rowmes, beinge open on y^e tope: the lower rowme they apparelled and dressed them selves ; and in the higher rowme they played ; and they stood vpon 6 wheeles." Sometimes these pageants were wheeled from place to place, sometimes the various plays were acted simultaneously so that time might be saved. Crude spectacular effects must have been aimed at : Noah's Ark was certainly in the likeness of a ship, and a dragon's mouth for Hell was there for every one to see. As a general rule, however, the plays must have been acted without scenery, or with scenery of a most crude kind. Costuming, on the other hand, even though it might be of a grotesque and primitive sort, was an important feature of the performances. One of the entries in the list of expenses at Canterbury was "a payer¹ of new gloves for Seynt Thomas," and at Chelmsford in Essex one John Wright was paid "for makynge a cotte² of lether for Christ." An inventory made in 1564 at the latter place included :

¹ Technically there is a distinction between the two, miracles dealing with the lives of saints and mysteries with themes taken from the Bible. The two titles, however, were practically synonymous in England.

ij vyces coates, and ij scalpes, ij daggers (j dagger wanted).

v prophets cappes (one wantinge).

iiij flappes for devils.

iiij shepehoks, iiij whyppes (but one gone).

From Coventry we learn that in 1544 "a new coat & a peir of hoes³ for Gabriell" cost three shillings and fourpence, while at Hull in 1494 "three skins for Noah's coat, making it, and a rope to hang the ship in the kirk" amounted to seven shillings ; "a payr of new mytens to Noye" cost fourpence. In 1504 at Leicester "linen cloth for the angels heads, and Jesus hoose" cost in all just ninepence, and the painting of the angels' wings cost eightpence. At Norwich in 1565 an inventory of property belonging to the Grocers' Company was prepared. This included :

2 cotes & a payre hosen⁴ for Eve, stayned.

A cote & hosen for Adam, Steyned.

A cote w^t ⁵ hosen & tayle for y^e serpente, steyned . . .

An Angell's Cote & over hoses of Apis Skynns.

A face & heare for y^e Father.

2 hearys for Adam & Eve.

¹ pair.

² coat.

³ hose.

⁴ of hose.

⁵ with.

THE GROWTH OF NATIVE DRAMA

No doubt increasing efforts were made by the great guilds to vie with one another in the presentation of the separate plays, and these inventories give us some idea as to how they went about their work.

The actors in these pieces were all amateurs—members of the various companies who for a time put aside their labour to perform in the sacred mysteries. They were generally paid for their services, but never looked upon their work as a regular profession. At Coventry in 1573 a certain Fawson received from one of the companies fourpence “for hangyng Judas” and fourpence “for Coc croyng.”¹ An anonymous actor received as much as three shillings and fourpence “for pleayng God,” and five shillings went “to iij whyte [saved] sollys [souls]” and five shillings “to iij blake [damned] sollys.” Again, “ij wormes of conseyence” earned sixteenpence between them. In 1483 at Hull Noah received one shilling; in 1494 in the same town Thomas Sawyr for personating God was given tenpence, while Noah’s wife received eightpence. The plays and their performances were, therefore, distinctively the creation of the common people, with all the defects and the virtues consequent upon that fact. The naïveté visible in the few extracts from the records given above may prepare us for a similar naïveté in the treatment of the subject-matter of the plays—both, of course, ultimately dependent upon the people who wrote and who witnessed these dramas. The audience was profoundly devout and sincere, but at the same time it unconsciously sought for ways of escape from its piety in all manner of licence. One way is to be seen in the incredibly coarse fabliaux of the time, and later in the equally coarse interludes. Here the moral teachings of the Church and the exalted ideals of chivalry were alike shattered to the ground. Another form of escape has already been touched upon—the various comic ceremonials of which the enthronement of the boy bishop and the Feast of the Asses are the best known. Here piety was thrown to the winds, and licence reigned. The gargoyles in the medieval cathedrals which grin down cynically on the worshippers are but another expression of this mood of abandon—a mood, however, which rarely becomes permanent. The gargoyles are but little outbursts of freakishness and gaiety in the midst of the mysterious grandeur of the vaulted nave and the solemn choir. For these people of the Middle Ages there was no such thing as form, as form is known in classic and in neo-classic art. With them drunkenness is found with the most mystic adoration, debauchery with the most lofty moral idealism, cynical ridicule with passionate worship, laughter with the solemnity of sacred thoughts.

¹ cock crowing.

It is natural that this grotesquerie should be reproduced in what is in some ways the most typical of medieval creations, the mystery or miracle play. The seriousness is there in all sooth in the figures of God and of His angels, in the terrible passion of Christ and in His resurrection from the dead, but there is also the laughter and the abandon, the escape from too high majesty. At one of the solemnest moments, as, for example, when the shepherds watch the star that was to herald the coming of a King over kings, this laughter breaks out, and we are treated to the fascinating little interlude of the thievish Mak and his companions. The general satire of women could not be stilled even in face of the worship of the Virgin Mary, and Noah's wife becomes a shrew, jeering at her husband and flouting him in a most disrespectful manner. Even the flaming terror of Satan was not exempt; rapidly he developed into a comic figure, roaring and lashing his tail, accompanied by a faithful Vice, who, with dagger of lath, as Shakespeare remembered, cried "Ah, ha!" in farcical wise. Herod, too, suffered in dignity. This slayer of infants, this murderer of murderers, developed into a comic type. His roaring and ranting became a recognized part of the performances of the time, and Shakespeare remembered him also in later days. Formless were the plays in which these characters appeared, lacking literary style often, and always wanting in correct artistic proportions—the work, as eighteenth-century critics would have said, of the "Gothick imagination."

THE GROWTH OF NATIVE DRAMA

In these dramas, however, lay the seeds that were later to blossom out into the plays of Shakespeare and his contemporaries. There is freshness of fancy here, a free treatment of the material, a rich fund of humour, and at times a true sense of the profound and the tragic. If with the mysteries we are but on the borders of drama proper, we can see clearly the various traditions which later were brought to culmination in the time of Queen Elizabeth.

These mystery plays were not confined to any one district of England. No doubt the record of many of them has perished, but acting can be traced during the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries in over one hundred and twenty-five towns and villages of Britain, extending from the south of England to the north, from the Welsh mountains to Edinburgh and Aberdeen, even across the sea to Dublin and Kilkenny. Some of these towns, no doubt, had no regular series of mystery plays of their own, but numbers must have treasured for centuries their own particular cycles. Those which have come down to us are unquestionably merely an infinitesimal portion of a literary activity once vast and far-reaching in its extent. Four cycles have been preserved—those of Chester (twenty-five plays, with an extra drama probably abandoned at the time of the Reformation), York (forty-eight plays and a small fragment of another), “Towneley” or Wakefield (thirty-two plays), and Coventry (forty-two plays in the Ludus Coventriæ and two separate dramas from the Coventry Corpus Christi cycle). Besides these there are extant a Grocers’ play of The Fall from Norwich; two dramas of Abraham and Isaac, one belonging probably to Northampton; a Shipwrights’ play from Newcastle-upon-Tyne; the so-called Croxton Sacrament, dating from the second half of the fifteenth century; the “Digby” plays of unknown origin; a stray drama of the Burial and Resurrection; the Shrewsbury fragments; and a set of five plays in the Cornish tongue, presenting interesting parallels with features in the extant English examples.

It is impossible here to deal with all or even many of these plays in detail. It may be sufficient to outline the scope of the best-preserved of the series, the York cycle, and, allowing for individual variations, to treat it as a type for all. This cycle, as has been indicated, contains forty-eight separate dramas, as well as a solitary fragment which was probably added toward the close of the fifteenth century. The whole series is now preserved in a manuscript in the British Museum (Add. MS. 35290). In it the various component parts are clearly apportioned to the various guilds, of which something will be said below. A list of the contents of the manuscript will facilitate discussion :

BRITISH DRAMA

- (1) Barkers. The Creation, Fall of Lucifer.
- (2) Plasterers. The Creation to the Fifth Day.
- (3) Cardmakers. The Creation of Adam and Eve.
- (4) Fullers. Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden.
- (5) Coopers. The Disobedience and Fall.
- (6) Armourers. The Expulsion from Eden.
- (7) Glovers. Cain and Abel.
- (8) Shipwrights. The Building of the Ark.
- (9) Fishers and Mariners. Noah and the Flood.
- (10) Parchminers and Bookbinders. Abraham's Sacrifice.
- (11) Hosiers. Israelites in Egypt, Ten Plagues and the Passage of the Red Sea.
- (12) Spicers. The Annunciation.
- (13) Pewterers and Founders. Joseph and Mary.
- (14) Tile-thatchers. The Journey to Bethlehem.
- (15) Chandlers. The Shepherds.
- (16) Masons. The Coming of the Three Kings to Herod.
- (17) Goldsmiths. The Adoration.
- (18) Marchals.¹ The Flight into Egypt.
- (19) Girdlers and Nailers. Massacre of the Innocents.
- (20) Spurriers and Lorimers.² The Disputation in the Temple.
- (21) Barbers. The Baptism of Christ.
- (22) Smiths. The Temptation of Christ.
- (23) Couriours.³ The Transfiguration.
- (24) Capmakers. The Woman taken in Adultery and the Raising of Lazarus.
- (25) Skinners. Entry into Jerusalem.
- (26) Cutlers. The Conspiracy.
- (27) Baxters.⁴ The Last Supper.
- (28) Cordwainers. The Agony and Betrayal.

¹ Men who shod horses.

² Curriers of leather.

² Makers of bits for horses.

⁴ Bakers.

THE GROWTH OF NATIVE DRAMA

- (29) Bowers¹ and Fletchers.² Peter's Denial and Christ before Caiaphas.
- (30) Tapiterers³ and Couchers. The Dream of Pilate's Wife and Christ before Pilate.
- (31) Lytsterers.⁴ The Trial before Herod.
- (32) Cooks and Waterleaders. The Second Accusation before Pilate with the Remorse of Judas.
- (33) Tilemakers. The Judgment on Christ.
- (34) Shearmen. Calvary.
- (35) Pinners⁵ and Painters. The Crucifixion.
- (36) Butchers. The Mortification of Christ.
- (37) Sadlers. The Harrowing of Hell.
- (38) Carpenters. The Resurrection.
- (39) Winedrawers. Christ appears to Mary Magdalen.
- (40) Sledmen. Travellers to Emmaus.
- (41) Hatmakers, Masons, and Labourers. The Purification of Mary.
- (42) Scriveners. The Incredulity of Thomas.
- (43) Tailors. The Ascension.
- (44) Potters. The Descent of the Holy Spirit.
- (45) Drapers. The Death of Mary.
- (46) Wefferes.⁶ The Appearance of our Lady to Thomas.
- (47) Ostlers. The Assumption and Coronation of the Virgin.
- (48) Mercers. The Judgment Day.
- (49) [fragment]. Innholders. The Coronation of Our Lady.

Such is the register of the plays in the British Museum manuscript, and it may be taken as fairly typical of the similar series of plays being performed all over Britain. The first point of interest about them is the close connexion of the plays with the trade guilds. It might be said, indeed, that without these trade guilds the regular cycles of mystery plays could never have come into being. The guilds provided the actors, and, what is more important, they provided the money for the pageants, the primitive 'scenery,' and the costumes. It will be noted how in many instances plays were given to guilds specially qualified to deal with them; thus the mariners took the Flood, and the goldsmiths the Adoration. Secondly, it will be observed that these plays cannot be judged critically on any standards such as are applicable to other dramas. Each play stands alone,

¹ Makers of bows.

² Those who feathered arrows.

³ Makers of tapestry.

⁴ Dyers.

⁵ Makers of pins.

⁶ Weavers.

yet all are but parts in a vast cycle which is a kind of Divina Commedia in the medieval sense of the term. Moreover, there could be nothing more futile than to attempt a general criticism of these works, or even of particular cycles, as one can criticize the plays of Marlowe or of Shakespeare. For the mystery plays have no author, or countless authors, put it in which way we will. The cycles were constantly changing. Unquestionably portions were added to or taken away from particular plays. The whole cycles are typically medieval in their almost complete anonymity. All we may do, therefore, is to indicate some of the chief points in one or two of the dramas or separate cycles, stressing chiefly those elements which might be held to offer hints to the regular dramatists of later years.

From the literary point of view the York cycle is possibly the least entertaining. Its high-water mark of excellence is to be found in the last few plays dealing with the Passion of Christ, but even here there is little that strikes us as great or even as possessing the potentialities of greatness. The value of this cycle is largely historic and linguistic. The Chester cycle presents, on the other hand, certain features of interest. This series may have been influenced slightly by the plays of York, and certainly something seems taken from the great French Mystère du Vieil Testament, but there is about these dramas a genuine devoutness of tone which appeals even to a modern reader. Not that the grotesque elements are wanting. They are displayed here clearly in the waterleaders' pageant of The Deluge, where Noah's wife appears in her traditional guise of a scolding shrew.

Noe. Wife, come in ! why standes thou here ?
thou art ever froward, that dare I sweare.
Come in, on gods half ! tyme yt were,
for feare lest that we drowne.

uxor Noe.¹ Yea, Sir, set vp your sayle and rowe forth with evill heale ² !
for, without any fayle,
I will not out of this towne.
But ³ I haue my gossips everichon,⁴ one foote further I will not gone

¹ Noah's wife.

² health.

³ unless.

⁴ every one.

THE GROWTH OF NATIVE DRAMA

they shall not drowne, by St John, and ¹ I may save their lyfe.
they loved me full well, by christ ;
but thou wilt let them in thy chist, ² els rowe forth, Noe, whether thou list, and get thee a new wife.

Noe. Sem, sonne, loe, thy mother is wraw.³
for sooth such another I do not know.

Sem. Father, I shall fett ⁴ her in, I trow, without any fayle.

Mother, my father after thee send,
And bydds the into yonder ship wend loke vp and se the wynde, for we be readye to sayle.

uxor Noe. Sonne, goe again to him and say :
I will not come therein to daye.

Noe. Come in wife, in 20 devills waye,
Or else stand there without. . . .

uxor Noe. That will I not for all your call, but I haue my gossopes all.

Sem. In faith, mother, yet you shall, whether you will or not. [tunc ibit. ⁵

Noe. Welcome, wife, into this boate.

uxor Noe. And haue thou that for thy mote ⁶ !
[Et dat alapam vita. ⁷

Noe. A ! ha ! mary, this is hote, ⁸ it is good to be still.

Whatever jollification may appear in scenes such as this, it is, however, the emotion appearing in these Chester plays that calls for most attention. It is nowhere better expressed than in the play of Abraham's Sacrifice, performed by the Barbers and the Wax-chandlers. The portraits of Abraham and Isaac are well drawn, and there is a perfect charm in the childlike presentation of this heart-touching story.

Abraham. Make thee ready, my Derling, for we must doe a lyttle thing.
this wood vpon thy back thou bring,
we must not long abyde. . . .

¹ if.

² chest, or Ark.

³ angry.

⁴ fetch.

⁵ Here she is forced into the Ark.

⁶ speech or argument.

⁷ She gives him a slap (vita probably = victa, 'being conquered').

⁸ hot.

BRITISH DRAMA

Isaak. Father, I am all readye to doe your bydding mekelie, to bear this wood full bowne¹ am I,
as you commaunde me.

Abraham. O Isaak, Isaak, my derling deere, my blessing now I geve the² here.
take vp this fagot with good cheare,
and on thy backe yt bringe,
and fire with me I will take.

Isaake. Your bydding I will not forsake, father, I will never slake to fulfill your bydding.

[Tunc Isaak accipiet lignum super tergum et ad montem pariter Ibunt.³

Abraham. Now Isaake, sonne, goe we our waye to yonder mountayne, if that we maye

Isaake. My dere father, I will assaye to follow you full fayne.

Abraham. O ! my hart will break in three, to heare thy wordes I have pyttie.
as thou wilt, lord, so must yt be :
to thee I will be bayne.⁴
lay downe thy fagot, my owne sonne deere !

Isaak. All ready, father, loe yt is here.
but why mak you so heavie cheare ?⁵ are you any thing adred⁶ ?
father, if it be your will,
wher is the beast that we shall kill ?

Abraham. Ther is non, sonne, vpon this hill that I see here in this steed.⁷ . . .

Isaak. Father, tell me of this case, why you your sword drawn hase, and beare yt naked in this place ;
thereof I have great wonder.

Abraham. Isaac, sonne, peace ! I pray thee, thou breakes my harte even in three.

Isaac. I praye you, father, leane⁸ nothing from me, but tell me what you thinke.

Abraham. O Isaac, Isaac, I must thee kill.

Isaac. Alas ! father, is that your will, your owne childe here for to spill,⁹ vpon this hilles brynke ? . . .

¹ ready.

² thee.

³ Here Isaac takes up the wood on his back, and both go off to the hill.

⁴ obedient.

⁵ Why are you so heavy of heart ?

⁶ afraid.

⁷ place.

⁸ keep.

⁹ destroy.

THE GROWTH OF NATIVE DRAMA

Abraham. O my sonne, I am sory to doe to thie this great anye¹;
Gods Comaundment do must I, his workes are ay full mylde.

Isaac. Wold God, my mother were here with me !
she wolde knele vpon her knee, praying you, father, if it might be,
for to save my life.

Abraham. O Comelie Creature, but ² I thee kill,
I greeve my God, and that full Ill :
I may not worke against his will but ever obedyent be,
O Isaac, Sonne, to thee I saye :
God has Comaunded me this daye sacrifice—this is no naye³—to make of thy boddye.⁴

Isaac. Is it Gods will I shold be slaine ?

Abraham. yea, sonne, it is not for to layne⁵ ;
to his bydding I will be bayne, ever to his pleasinge. . . .

Isaac. Mary ! father, God forbydd but you doe your offringe.
Father, at home your sonnes you shall finde that you must love by course of kinde.⁶ be I once out of your mynde, your sorrow may sone⁷ cease,
But you must doe Gods bydding.
father, tell my mother for nothing.

It is easy to see here the emotional power, even if expressed in crude phraseology, which was later to give inspiration to more artistic and more cultured dramatists.

Clear marks of composite authorship are afforded in the so-called "Towneley" cycle, which probably belongs to the town of Wakefield. Some of the plays are evidently taken over from the York series or belong to some common source ; others are independent, but of small literary value ; and a few (plays iii, xii, xiii, xiv, and xxi) are characterized by a humour freer and bolder than anything visible in the other mystery cycles. Indeed, in those five plays we have the first sure signs of the hand of a writer possessing independent thought and individual expression. The five

¹ annoy (= harm).

² unless.

³ there is no denying.

⁴ body.

⁵ to be denied.

⁶ nature.

⁷ soon.

BRITISH DRAMA

plays deal with Noah, the Shepherds, the Adoration, and the last days of Christ. Of these unquestionably that which possesses most interest is the so-called Secunda Pastorum (Nos. xii and xiii are both shepherds' plays), in which occurs the delightful native pastoral of Mak and his companions. The shepherds are shown chatting "in rustic row"; Mak enters to them, and, when they lie down to sleep, he succeeds in stealing a lamb. His companions awake, and find their loss. Together they troop down to Mak's cottage and knock at the door. Mak lets them in, and they see a cradle (in which the sheep is wrapped up). The third shepherd wishes to see the supposed child:

Gyf me lefe ¹ hym to kys and lyft vp the clowtt.² what the dewill is this? he has a long snowte.

primus pastor. he is merkyd ³ amys. we wate ill abowte.

ijus pastor. Ill spon ⁴ weft, Iwys ⁵ ay commys foull owte.⁶

Ay, so!

he is lyke to oure shepe!

ijus pastor. how, gyb! may I pepe?

primus pastor. I trow, kynde ⁷ will crepe where it may not go. . . .

Mak. Peasse ⁸ bid I: what! lett be youre fare;

I am he that hym gatt and yond woman hym bare.

primus pastor. What dewill shall he hatt ⁹? Mak? lo god!

Makys ayre.¹⁰

ijus pastor. lett be all that. now god gyf hym care, I sagh.¹¹

Vxor. A pratty child is he

As syttys on a woman's kne;

A dyllydowne, perde,

To gar ¹² a man laghe.

ijus pastor. I know hym by the eere marke that is a good tokyn.

Mak. I tell you, surs, hark! hys noyse ¹³ was brokyn.

Sythen told me a clerk that he was forspokyn.¹⁴ . . .

Vxor. he was takyn with an elfe,

I saw it myself.

when the clock stroke twelf was he forshapyn.¹⁵

ijus pastor. ye two ar well feft sam in a stede.¹⁶

¹ leave.

² cloth.

³ marked.

⁴ spun.

⁵ truly.

⁶ out. ⁷ nature.

⁸ peace.

⁹ be called.

¹⁰ Mak's heir.

¹¹ say.

¹² make.

¹³ nose.

¹⁴ bewitched.

¹⁵ misshaped.

¹⁶ Literally, endowed together in one place, i.e., both in the plot.

THE GROWTH OF NATIVE DRAMA

iiijus pastor. Syn thay manteyn thare theft let do thaym to dede.¹

Mak. If I trespass eft gyrd of my heede.² with you will I be left.³

primus pastor. Syrs, do my reede.⁴

ffor this trespass, we will nawther ban ⁵ ne flyte.⁶
ffyght nor chyte,⁷
Bot haue done as tyte,⁸
And cast hym in canvas.⁹

This scene, because of its vivacity and realism, has become well known, but it is typical of many other scenes in which a crude kind of native comedy may be seen struggling to birth. Thus in the most terrible scene of the Crucifixion humour is introduced in the persons of four torturers. They work away at the cross, and start hauling it to its place :

Tercius tortor. So, that is well, it will not brest,¹⁰
But let us se who dos the best with any slegthe of hande.

iiijus tortor. Go we now vnto the othere ende ;
ffelowse, fest ¹¹ on fast youre hende,¹²
And pull well at this band.

primus tortor. I red,¹³ fellowse, by this wedyr,¹⁴
That we draw all ons togedir,¹⁵
And loke how it wyll fare.

ijus tortor. let now se and lefe ¹⁶ youre dyn !
And draw we ilka syn from syn ¹⁷ ;
ffor nothyng let vs spare.

iiijus tortor. Nay, fellowse, this is no gam ¹⁸ !
we will no longere draw all sam,¹⁹
So mekill ²⁰ haue I asspyed.

iiijus tortor. No, for as haue ²¹ I blys !
Som can twyk,²² who so it is,
Sekys easse on some kyn syde.²³ primus tortor. It is better, as I hope,

On by his self ²⁴ to draw this rope,

¹ do them to death. ² head. ³ I will agree with your judgment.

⁴ act according to my counsel. ⁵ curse. ⁶ quarrel. ⁷ chide.

⁸ quickly. ⁹ toss him in a blanket. ¹⁰ burst. ¹¹ fasten.

¹² hands. ¹³ counsel. ¹⁴ weather. ¹⁵ together. ¹⁶ leave.

¹⁷ sinew from sinew. ¹⁸ game. ¹⁹ together. ²⁰ much.

²¹ may have. ²² pull slightly. ²³ on some side or another.

²⁴ each by himself.

BRITISH DRAMA

And then may we se who it is that ere while
All his felows can begyle,
Of this companye.

Secundus tortor. Sen ¹ thou will so haue, here for me !
now draw I, as myght thou the ² ?

Tercius tortor. Thou drew right wele.³
haue here for me half a foyte ⁴ !

quartus tortor. wema,⁵ man ! I trow thou doyte !

Thou flyt ⁶ it neuer a dele ⁷ ;
Bot haue for me here that I may !

primus tortor. Well drawn, son, bi this day !

Thou gose well to thi warke !

Secundus tortor. yit efte,⁸ whils thy hande is in, pull therat with some kyn gyn.⁹

ijus tortor. yee, & bryng it to the marke.

quartus tortor. pull, pull !

primus tortor. haue now !

ijus tortor. let se !

ijus tortor. A ha !

iiijus tortor. yit a draght ¹⁰ !

primus tortor. Therto with all my maght ¹¹ ijus tortor. A ha ! hold still thore ¹² !

ijus tortor. So, felowse ! looke now belyfe, which of you can best dryfe,
And I shall take the bore.¹³

The other stray examples of mysteries need not detain us much further, although the Ludus Coventriæ, if only for its peculiar character as an unattached cycle and for its fanciful theology, deserves close attention. This series of forty-two plays has nothing to do with the regular Coventry Corpus Christi cycle, of which all but a fragment has perished, and which was most probably performed at more than one town. Apart from these major series the most interesting relics we possess are the actors' parts for three little playlets of an exceedingly primitive type. These actors' parts were discovered at Shrewsbury in 1890 and show clearly how the Latin anthems at Christmas and Easter were gradually

¹ since. ² thrive. ³ well. ⁴ foot. ⁵ alas !

⁶ move. ⁷ bit. ⁸ yet once again.

⁹ with some kind of cunning ('gin' means either 'engine'—tool, lever, etc.—or 'artifice').

¹⁰ yet another pull. ¹¹ might. ¹² there.

¹³ hole (with reference to the hole in which the Cross is to stand).

THE GROWTH OF NATIVE DRAMA

adorned with fragments of dialogue in the vernacular. The Officium Pastorum gives us the basis of the later shepherds' plays, the Officium Resurrectionis the elaboration of the Quem Quæritis trope, and the Officium Peregrinorum the first stage of development in the ever-popular story of Christ's reappearance before his disciples. The majority of the other extant mysteries and miracles have less intrinsic value. The Newcastle Shipwrights' play is in the ordinary tradition; the Abraham and Isaac probably belonging to Northampton is interesting for its association with the French Mystère du Vieil Testament; and the "Digby" plays of The Conversion of St Paul, St Mary Magdalene, and The Massacre of the Innocents show evidence of a capable authorship. None, however, deserves detailed mention here. Two points of historical importance might, on the other hand, be noted in the Norwich play of The Fall and in the Croxton Sacrament. In the second version of the former there are introduced the figures of Dolor, Myserye, and the Holy Ghost, showing that the original mystery tradition was widening itself to include characters not in the sacred text, and was approaching the allegorical types of the moralities. In the latter, which dates from the second half of the fifteenth century, there is a note that "ix may play yt at ease," a sign possibly that the original guild actors were giving way to professional players, who were touring the country and presenting the pieces originally associated with amateur performances.

What, it may be asked in conclusion, is to be our final judgment on this mystery tradition so far as it concerns the development of dramatic art? Obviously there are many defects in the plays. They are chaotic in construction, the cycles forbidding the more ordered expression of individual thoughts and feelings. Conservatism, moreover, rules these dramas. The stories and the types were already there before the authors when they sat down to write. Hardly any scope was offered to the dramatist who might have superabundant dramatic inventiveness. The stiltedness of the language affects us also; clearly the writers are fettered by the various rimes and measures in which the dialogue is cast. On the other hand, we see many possibilities for future advance. The mysteries gave to the people of England a taste for theatrical shows ; they prepared the ground for the Elizabethan drama of later date ; they provided the basis for further development along artistic lines. There was little here that was artificial and imitative. In origin the English mysteries may have borrowed much from the French plays of a similar type, but fundamentally they breathed of English soil. The anachronisms permitted by the lax standards of medieval art, moreover, allowed a freshness and vitality of treatment which would have been impossible under different conditions. Cain becomes an English peasant of grasping and rapacious mood ; the shepherds in the Secunda Pastorum are not the shepherds of Palestine, but the shepherds of an English countryside ; Noah's wife is a " cursed shrew " of some provincial town. The serious scenes, too, have frequently this realistic flavour. The murderers who surround Christ in the Wakefield play of The Crucifixion are native types and owe nothing to their historical surroundings. It is the freshness, then, of the mystery plays which deserves our attention, for it was this freshness added to a sense of form borrowed from a study of classical art which gave to us the glories of the Shakespearian drama.

BRITISH DRAMA

CHAPTER III

THE DEVELOPMENT OF PROFESSIONAL DRAMA

THE MORALITY PLAYS

THE exact steps in the advance from miracle play to morality are exceedingly difficult to trace, although a hint of the process is provided in the Norwich play, The Fall, noted in the last chapter. All we can say is that some century and a half after the miracles had first become an established form the morality play makes its definite appearance. These morality plays differ entirely from the other type. In the first place, they are all much longer than any of the component parts of a mystery cycle, and some are divided after the manner of the Senecan tragedies into acts and scenes. Nor were they written for precisely the same audience. Many were clearly penned for production in the halls of persons more aristocratic than those who witnessed the mysteries, and the majority, if not all, of them must have been performed by professional actors. The notes on the title-pages of Impacyente pouerte that "Foure men may well and easelye playe thys Interlude," and of Welth and Helth that "Foure may easely play this Playe" point almost certainly to the small band of strolling players. Here, too, we find for the first time clear indications of individual authorship. Wrapped as the moralities may be in medieval abstractions, with them the drama begins to move into the light of the modern age. On many of them renascent humanism has set its seal.

The moralities are all characterized by the use of abstractions and of allegorical characters as the dramatis personæ. At first sight this might appear to be a retrogression from the real, or supposedly real, figures of the mystery plays, but the retrogression is more apparent than actual. Constantly the allegory as such is breaking down, and contemporary traits are given to the Deadly Sins and Everlasting Wisdoms in which these plays abound. Thus Evil Counsel in the play called Johan the Euangelyst is a portrait of the Tudor age. His words have nothing in them that would connect him with the title of the play.

For sythe ¹ I came fro Rochester
 I haue ² spente all my wynnyng ³
 By our lady I wyll no more goo to Couentry
 For there knaues set me on the pyllery ⁴
 And threwe egges at my hede ⁵
 So sore that my nose dyd blede
 Of whyte wyne galons thurty.

This is a roysterer of early days speaking, not an abstraction. The peculiar paradox, therefore, is that in apparently drawing drama away from realism to allegory the morality writers succeeded in linking it still closer with actual life. The comic scenes in these moralities have in them the germs of that humour which later supplied the authors of the interludes, from whom it was passed on to the comedy writers of Elizabethan times. The rough farce of the scene in Redford's Wyt and Science (c. 1541-8) in which Ignorancy gets Idleness to pronounce his name in syllables, the similar scene in Respublica where Avarice teaches Adulation the word 'reformation' by the same means, the introduction of broken Dutch in the figure of Hance Beerpot in Welth and Helth, all show quite clearly the potentialities inherent in this style. For tragedy too there lay great possibilities in this form of drama. The cardinal feature of nearly all the moralities was the pursuit of Everyman (Humanum Genus or Mankind) by evil forces and his rescue by Conscience or Wisdom. Not only are the abstractions rendered into contemporary types, but the thoughts and emotions of man are personified. It is not fanciful here to see the beginnings of that tragic soul-struggle which later became so marked a characteristic of the Shakespearian drama. Men were taught here the secret of progression of character and the delineation of conflicting passions. And to these features of the morality plays must be added the sense of construction and unity

¹ since.

² The letters u and v at this period were often transposed.

³ winnings, earnings, or income.

⁴ pillory.

⁵ head.

DEVELOPMENT OF PROFESSIONAL DRAMA

of form previously referred to, which set them far apart from the chaotic heterogeneity of the mystery cycles.

The best known of all the moralities is Everyman (end of fifteenth century), which may have formed the original of, or itself may have been taken from, the corresponding Dutch play of Elckerlijck.¹ Superior though this drama be to the majority of these fifteenth- and sixteenth-century works, it is not untypical of a large class of similarly moral plays. In it God calls upon Death, who approaches Everyman. Fellowship, Kindred, Goods, and all worldly things forsake him; only Good Deeds consents to follow him over the passage of the grave. The verse of this drama is very poetic and marks it out as being one of the chief works of fifteenth-century literature. Along with Everyman may be taken a whole series of kindred moral plays. Man-kynd presents the hero befriended by Mercy and attacked by the rascally company of Nought, New-gyse, and Nowadays. The scenes in which these vagabonds appear are genuinely comic, and the desires of the audience are well seen in a passage which precedes the entrance of Titivillus, the devil. New-gyse and Nowadays decide that this will be a good moment to take a gathering from the audience, and, turning to the spectators, they proffer the collecting-bag:

New-gyse. 3e²! go þi³ wey⁴! we xall⁵ gaþer money on-to;
Ellys þer xall no man hym se.⁶

Now gostly to owur purpos, worschypfull souerence⁷!
We intende to gather mony, yf yt plesse yowur neclygence.⁸
For a man with a hede þat [is] of grett omnipotens.

Nowadays. Keep yowur tayll, in goodnes, I prey yow, goode broþer!

He ys a worschyp[f]ull man, sers, sauynge yowur reuerens;
He loughth no grotis, nor pens or to-pens.⁹
Gyf ws rede royallys,¹⁰ yf 3e wyll se hys abhomynabull presens.

New-gyse. Not so! 3e þat mow not pay þe ton, pay þe toþer!¹¹

¹ See the edition of the latter by Professor H. Logeman (1892) for a discussion of the relationship of the two plays.

² Yea (= y). ³ thy (þ = th). ⁴ way. ⁵ shall.

⁶ or else no man shall see him. ⁷ sovereigns. ⁸ your negligence.

⁹ He doesn't love groats, or pence or twopenny pieces.

¹⁰ Give us red royals (a coin).

¹¹ Not so! You that can't pay the one, pay the other!

BRITISH DRAMA

In Henry Medwall's goodly interlude of Nature (end of fifteenth century) Man is addressed by Nature, while Bodily Lust, Sensuality, and Worldly Affection strive to draw him away from Reason. Moral in aim, too, is Johan the Euangelyst, where Evil Counsel and Idleness play the wicked parts. The contemporary features of the former have already been commented upon. A Newe Interlude of Impacyente pouerte (printed 1560) is of a similar cast. Envy, Collhassarde, and Mysrule play the vagabond crew, and are opposed by Peace and Pouerte. Here once more the realism of the presentation of the dramatis personæ attracts our notice. This realism is further increased in An enterlude of Welth, and Helth, very mery and full of Pastyme (early sixteenth century), in which Welth and Shrowdwyt are as full of vitality as any character in regular sixteenth-century farce. Dialect is here introduced by Hance Beerpot, and Ill Wyll in some scenes pretends he is Spanish and speaks a kind of mixed language with English and Spanish forms. In this play we are close to the comic interlude proper. The Pride of Life (early fifteenth century) is nearer to the mystery tradition with its characters Rex Vivus, Primus Miles Fortitudo, and Secundus Miles Sanitas, but in the Nuntius Mirth it draws close to the realism of the others. Mind, Will and Understanding has a slightly variant theme in the presentation of Anima with her three parts, Mind, Will, and Understanding, seduced by Lucifer and reconverted by Everlasting Wisdom. A struggle for the soul of Humanum Genus is once more to be found in The Castell of Perseverance (early fifteenth century), one of the earliest-known moralities. A Malus Angelus with the Seven Deadly Sins and a Bonus Angelus with the Six Divine Graces are the chief contending forces. Of slightly different features are the propre newe Interlude of the Worlde and the Chylde, otherwyse called Mundus & Infans (printed 1522) and John Skelton's better-known Magnyfycence, a goodly interlude, and a mery (printed 1529-33). The latter is particularly interesting as showing the influence of humanistic thought upon this form of drama, the didactic aim being not so much moral as calculated to convey a truth emphasized by many classic philosophers—the folly of expending money lavishly and trusting all to friends who may prove false. Even Magnyfycence, however, skilfully as that is written, is of minor importance when it is set beside Sir David Lyndsay's work in the Scottish dialect, Ane Satyre of the thrie Estaits, in commendation of vertew and vituperation of vyce (c. 1540). This is a much more ambitious work than any of the pieces we have considered above. It takes the form of a disputation surrounding Rex Humanitas between Diligence and Wantonnes, which gives place to an "Interlude" introducing as its chief character "Pauper, the pure Man." Through the last named Lyndsay proceeds to satirize the corruptions of Church and of State, his bitter style showing clearly his own feelings and thoughts. Thus Pauper proceeds to give an account of his position :

DEVELOPMENT OF PROFESSIONAL DRAMA

Gude-man, will 3e gif me 3our Charitie,
 And I sall declair 3ow the black veritie.
 My father was ane auld man, and ane hoir,¹
 And was of age fourscoir of 3eirs ² and moir ³ ;
 And Mald, my mother, was fourscoir and fyfteine ;
 And with my labour I did thame baith susteine,
 Wee had ane Meir,⁴ that caryit salt and coill ;⁵
 And everie ilk ⁶ 3eir scho ⁷ brocht vs hame ane foill.⁸
 Wee had thrie ky,⁹ that was baith fat and fair,—
 Nane tydier into the toun of Air.¹⁰
 My father was sa waik ¹¹ of blude and bane,¹²
 That he deit ¹³ ; quhairfoir my mother maid great maine.¹⁴
 Then scho deit, within ane day or two ;
 And thair began my povertie and wo.
 Our gude gray Meir was bairtand ¹⁵ on the feild ;
 And our Lands laird tuik hir for his hyreild.¹⁶
 The Vickar tuik the best Cow be ¹⁷ the head,
 Incontinent, quhen ¹⁸ my father was deid ;

¹ hoar (= white). ³ years. ⁵ more. ⁴ mare.

⁵ which carried salt and coal. ⁶ each. ⁷ she. ⁸ foal.

⁹ kine. ¹⁰ Ayr. ¹¹ weak. ¹² bone. ¹³ died.

¹⁴ wherefore my mother made great lament (moan).

¹⁵ batterned.

¹⁶ took her for his rent or heriot (by which a lord claims the best animal on the death of a tenant). ¹⁷ by. ¹⁸ when.

BRITISH DRAMA

And, quhen the Vickar hard tel how that my mother
 Was dead, free-hand he tuke to him ane vther.¹
 Then Meg, my wife, did murne, both evin & morow,
 Till, at the last, scho deit for verie sorow.
 And, quhen the Vickar hard tell my wyfe was dead,
 The thrid Cow he cleikit be the head.²
 Thair vmost clayis,³ that was of rapploch⁴ gray,
 The Vickar gart⁵ his Clark bare them away.
 Quhen all was gaine, I micht mak na debeat,⁶
 Bot, with my bairns, past for till beg my meat.⁷
 Now haue I tald 3ow the blak veritie,
 How I am brocht into this miserie.

Diligence, to whom he tells this tale, is surprised and questions him :

How did 3e person⁸ ? Was he not thy gude freind ?
 to which Pauper at once makes reply :

The devil stick him ! He curst me for my teind,⁹
 And halds me 3it¹⁰ vnder that same proces,
 That gart me want the Sacrament at Pasche.¹¹
 In gude faith, sir, thocht he wald cut my throt,
 I haue na geir¹² except ane Inglis grot,¹³
 Quhilk I purpois to gif ane man of law.¹⁴

The answer of Diligence is straight and to the point :

Thou art the daftest fuill¹⁵ that ever I saw.
 Trows thou, man, be the law to get remeid
 Of men of kirk ?¹⁶ Na, nocht till thou be deid.¹⁷

Lyndsay's satire, with its biting realistic touches, is far in advance of any of the English moralities.

Very soon the morality as such passed into the service of other parties than that of the moral teachers. Already we can trace a political element in Lyndsay's work, and this is intensified in Respublica (1553), a well-written drama

¹ immediately he took another.

² last clothes. ⁴ a kind of tweed.

³ caught by the head.

⁵ ordered, caused.

⁶ I could make no reply (do nothing).

⁷ went away to beg for food.

⁸ parson.

⁹ He excommunicated me for my tithes (i.e., for not paying them).

¹⁰ holds me yet. ¹¹ which makes me go without Communion at Easter.

¹² property.

¹³ English groat.

¹⁴ which I intend to give a lawyer.

¹⁵ maddest fool.

¹⁶ Do you expect to get remedy from the clergy by means of the law ?

¹⁷ No, not till you're dead.

DEVELOPMENT OF PROFESSIONAL DRAMA

directed against the reformers. The scenes of the People here are excellently conducted. So too in Wyt and Science (1541-8) we find the morality being used in the cause of humanism against the forces of Ignorancy and Idleness, who both appear among the dramatis personæ. In every way during the sixteenth century the scope of this form was being widened, so that it merged readily into the interlude proper.

One need devote no special comment to the fact that any account of the morality plays or of the mystery plays must necessarily be disproportioned. Many of the dramas written during those centuries must have perished irretrievably, although there is always hope that new examples will be discovered. It was only in 1906 that, in an Irish country mansion, three important moralities, otherwise unknown, suddenly came to light. Some fragments of a play called The Cruel Debtor (c. 1566), by one Wager, were unearthed recently in the British Museum, and in 1923 these were added to by the chance discovery of another leaf of the play.¹ Moreover, one of the most important links in the development of the drama, the godely interlude of Fulgens Cenatoure of Rome [and] Lucrez his daughter, turned up unexpectedly at the Mostyn sale of 1919. It may well be understood, therefore, that our knowledge of the drama of this period rests only upon a few scattered items of evidence which time has carelessly handed down to us. From what remains we can but hazard a few generalizations which may come more or less close to the truth. The morality play marks no retrogressive movement. In it there are suggested many possibilities of future development both in tragedy and in comedy; many of the characters presented, even though their names may be allegorical, have a vitality lacking in later dramas intended to be realistic. The profound devotion of the authors gave to their plays a deep seriousness of tone, and their inherent sense of humour provided comic scenes of a truly excellent cast. In several particular ways, too, these authors of the moralities handed on traditions later to be transformed in the Elizabethan period. Of these traditions, that of the Vice may be taken as typical. The Vice has already been found in the mystery plays ; he becomes an established figure in the morality. His sense of fun, his rascality, his quips, and his jests made him a stock figure, and it is no mere fancy that finds him under the guise of Feste and Touchstone at the close of the sixteenth century.

¹ See Malone Society Collections, i, 4 and 5, and ii, 2.

BRITISH DRAMA

(ii) FROM SYMBOLISM TO REALISM. THE INTERLUDES AND COURT PLAYS

In passing from the morality proper to the interlude, the same warning concerning the scantiness of the texts preserved must once more be given. It is even more certain here that countless plays have perished. A glance at Professor Feuillerat's volumes of records from the Revels' accounts will display clearly the loss of these early dramas. Of many plays mentioned there only an infinitesimal portion has come down to us. Again, therefore, any account of this dramatic development must be regarded as tentative rather than final in character.

The word 'interlude' seems to have had, and still to have, no very definite meaning. It may imply simply a 'play' in the sense that it is a ludus carried on between (inter) several characters ;¹ but the use of the term in Lyndsay's Ane Satyre of the thrie Estaitis would seem to show that the alternative significance, that of a play in the midst of other festivities or business, was in the minds of many early writers. Unless we confine the term strictly to those plays of a realistic sort (as, for example, Heywood's) we can find no strict line of demarcation between it and the term 'morality.' As has been noted, many of the moralities proper were styled by their printers or authors 'interludes,' and even the characteristics of the two forms merge into one another. Thus Hyckescorner (early sixteenth century) is in the main a morality, yet shows a clear development toward the greater elaboration of purely comic elements ; so too do Thēterlude of Youth (reign of Mary), A new Enterlude called Thersytes (c. 1537), and John Rastell's A new Interlude and a mery of the nature of the .iiii. elements.

¹ See Sir E. K. Chambers, The Mediæval Stage, ii, 183.

DEVELOPMENT OF PROFESSIONAL DRAMA

It is with Rastell and those who were associated with him—Medwall, Sir Thomas More, and John Heywood—that we begin clearly to move into a new realm.¹ Here, for the first time, we meet with the introduction of purely secular characteristics. The group of plays concerned in this new movement includes Medwall's newly discovered Fulgens and Lucres and the kindred Calisto and Melebea (printed by Rastell) translated by an anonymous writer from an Italian version of the Spanish Celestina (1492). Besides these there are Heywood's A dialogue concerning witty and witless, A play of loue (printed 1534), and The Play of the wether (printed 1533), with the trilogy of interludes attributed to Heywood—The playe called the foure P.P. (printed 1543-7), A mery Play betwene the pardoner and the frere, the curate and neybour Pratte (c. 1513-21; printed 1533), and A mery play Betwene Johan Johan the husbande, Tyb his wyfe & syr Ihān the preest (printed 1533). To the above may also be added Of Gentylnes and Nobyltye. A dyaloge . . . compilid in maner of an enterlude (printed by Rastell), attributed, on what appears to be sure evidence, to Rastell by Dr A. W. Reed. Three clearly defined strata are revealed in this group of plays: a primitive débat kind of drama, exemplified in Heywood's three known plays; a coarse but hearty farce form shown in The foure P.P. and the two accompanying dramas; and a romantic comedy form displayed most notably in Fulgens and Lucres. The first is probably of least importance. A play of loue is somewhat confusing and artlessly arranged, and rises hardly at all above the levels of a mere debate. A dialogue concerning witty and witless has more of the vis comica in it, but does not present to us anything that calls for detailed mention. In The Play of the wether, on the other hand, we have a truly humorous little farce, wherein Jupiter appoints Mery-Reporte (the representative of the Vice) to summon before him all who might have complaints to make concerning the weather. A Gentrylman comes to demand it "Drye and not mysty, the wynde calme and styll," a Merchant to pray for it to be "Stormy, nor mysty, the wynde mesurable,¹" a Ranger to ask for "good rage of blustryng and blowynge," a Water Myller to beg for rain. At this point a Wynde Myller enters, and a quarrel breaks out between the two, to be stilled only when a Gentrylwoman comes to demand "wether close and temperate." A Launder wishes for sun, and a Boy for "plente of snow to make my snow-ballys." In the face of all these suits what can Jupiter do but give variety of weather at his own good will? Obviously here we are moving away from the world of pure abstractions and of didacticism; modern farce and comedy are in the making. A still further advance is made in the trilogy of farces generally attributed to Heywood, but lately associated in part at least with the better-known name of Sir Thomas More.² The pardoner and the frere carries us at once into the real surroundings of sixteenth-century life. This is as realistic as any comedy of Ben Jonson's, and only wants the liberation of more action to become an excellent comedy-farce. Johan Johan is equally good. The character of the husband is excellently drawn, and the scene where he sits burning his fingers over the fire while Syr Ihān and his wife consume the pie is excellently managed. For dialogue The foure P.P. is even finer. A Palmer, a Pardoner, a Potycary and a Pedler meet together and start telling stories. It is arranged that the one who tells the greatest lie will win a wager. The Pardoner tells of marvellous cures he has wrought, the Potycary of wonderful medicines. Then comes a lengthy tale by the Pardoner of how he sought a lady friend in the courts of Hades; Satan was willing to let her go on consideration that he should pardon all the women he could upon earth, women being such shrews in Hell that the place was becoming perfectly impossible. At this the ¹ moderate.

¹ The various papers contributed to The Library by Dr A. W. Reed, as well as his study on The Beginnings of the English Secular and Romantic Drama (Shakespeare Association), have thrown much new light on the development of the drama in the hands of this group.

BRITISH DRAMA

² See the papers of Dr A. W. Reed noted above.

DEVELOPMENT OF PROFESSIONAL DRAMA

Palmer interrupts to say that that is most peculiar, since in the whole of his varied experience he never once found a woman out of patience. The laurels promptly go to him for his lie.

In Calisto and Melebea and in Fulgens and Lucrez we are taken to another realm, the realm of romance. Here, unquestionably, is to be seen the basis on which was reared later the pure romantic comedy of Greene and Lyly and Shakespeare. In both we find the mixture of fun and rich sentiment which later was glorified in Twelfth Night and A Midsummer Night's Dream; and in the latter may be traced the first known appearance of a comic underplot such as we find in the Shakespearian drama.

The influence of foreign drama, and of foreign literature generally, is evident in these plays, and by this time various attempts were being made to translate or to imitate works by the classic writers or by the new bands of humanists. Thus A new Enterlude for Chyldren to playe, named Jacke Jugeler, both wytte, and very playsent shows the influence of Plautus' Amphitruo; Necromantia is A dialog of the poet Lucyan . . . now lately translated; J. Palsgrave's The Comedye of Acolastus (printed 1540) is a rendering "into our englysshe tongue" from the Acolastus (1530) of Wilhelm de Volder; and Henry Cheke's Freewyl (printed c. 1560) follows the Tragedia del libero Arbitrio (1546) of Francesco Nigri de Bassano. The English humanists, too, were trying their hands at dramas, sometimes in Latin, sometimes in English, generally with a religious colouring, based on classical models. Nicholas Grimald produced a Christus redivivus. Comœdia tragica, sacra et nova (1543) and an Archipropheta (1547), John Bale a series of religious plays most of which are now non-extant. Of those which have been preserved by the latter writer A Tragedye or enterlude manyfestyng the Chefe promyses of God unto man (written 1538, printed 1577), A Breve Comedy or Enterlude of Johan Baptystes (written 1538, printed c. 1577), and A Comedy concernynge thre lawes (written 1538, printed c. 1580) are relics of the old mystery tradition adapted to later conditions, but Kynge Johan (written before 1548) presents a novel development. Here the abstractions loved by the morality writers are inextricably intermingled with real figures of John's reign, the realism of the presentation becoming apparent in countless scenes and passages. Interesting as this and the kindred movements are, however, we cannot attribute much influence on the growth of English secular drama to these religious humanists, with their somewhat dull and distinctly unpopular plays.

BRITISH DRAMA

The impression of humanism, on the other hand, was making itself felt on the primitive drama of the sixteenth century, and it is out of this humanistic movement that the first true tragedy and comedy spring.

(iii) EARLY TRAGI-COMEDIES

The exact point at which the true comedy and the true tragedy come into being, the precise movement from Heywood and the various morality writers to the playwrights who immediately preceded Marlowe, Greene, and Lyly, is extraordinarily difficult to trace, particularly when we know that many of the mid-sixteenth-century works have not come down to us. From the extant records, however, we may make some more or less definite deductions concerning the development of drama in these years. It is necessary at the outset to distinguish at least four types of play which arose, independently, out of the more primitive efforts of the earlier years. Regular comedy and regular tragedy are, naturally, two of these types, but alongside of them we must note the works of a tragi-comic sort and the chronicle histories.

In view of its retention of more primitive features it may be well to begin with the third type. The plays of this kind are of varying character, extending from the very primitive New cōmodye in englysh in maner Of an enterlude ryght elygant & full of craft of rethoryk wherein is shewd & dyscrybyd as well the bewte & good propertes of women as theyr vycys & euyll cōdiciōs (printed without a date; usually called Calisto and Melebea) to George Whetstone's Right Excellent and famous Historye, of Promos and Cassandra

DEVELOPMENT OF PROFESSIONAL DRAMA

(printed 1578). In addition to these two tragi-comedies, we possess of this group Henry Medwall's recently discovered and already mentioned Fulgens and Lucres, John Pikeryng's A Newe Enterlude of Vice Conteyninge, the Historye of Horestes (printed 1567), Thomas Preston's A lamentable Tragedie, mixed full of plesant mirth, containing the life of Cambises King of Percia (entered in the Stationers' Register 1569-70), Richard Edwards' The excellent Comedie of two the moste faithfullest Freendes, Damon and Pithias (acted probably in 1564), and R. B.'s A new Tragicall Comedie of Apius and Virginia (entered in the Stationers' Register 1567-8). All of these are bound together by certain ties. Every one mixes "lamentable Tragedie" with "pleasant mirth" or presents an atmosphere which may be called neither comic nor tragic. In this they are thoroughly romantic in tendency, defying the rigid canon of the neo-classicists concerning the various watertight divisions of literary form. Most are romantic also in betraying the presence of native features taken from the morality plays. The old Vice appears as Haphazard in Apius and Virginia and as Ambidexter in Cambises. On the other hand, all are taken either from classical legend or from works by foreign writers of the Renaissance. Calisto and Melebea is an adaptation of the Spanish Celestina; Fulgens and Lucres is taken from Bonaccorso da Pistoja's De Vera Nobilitate; the rest have some foundation on story or history of ancient days. All, moreover, show the influence both of Seneca and of Terence. The employment of types taken from the comedies of the one and the στιχομυθία (short one-lined dialogue) taken from the tragedies of the other prove the authors' indebtedness to classical example.

In view of the fact that not one of these plays has any very great literary value it is perhaps sufficient here to outline the features of one or two and take these as typical of the whole group. Apius and Virginia is the most "tragically" and the most primitive of all. We are presented here with a little Measure for Measure picture. Virginia, the daughter of Virginius, fires the heart of the judge Apus. With the aid of Mansipulus and Haphazard he contrives to pass a decree that Virginia shall be given to him, but she prefers death at her father's hands to shame. The little play is written throughout in jogging metre, dull enough in the serious and 'moral' parts, but not unsuitable for comic dialogue. On Haphazard's entry the author shows wherein lies his predilection. The language suddenly takes on a fresh turn and flashes with primitive vivacity :

BRITISH DRAMA

Very well sir, very well sir, it shalbe doone,
As fast as ever I can prepare,
Who dippes with the Diuel, he had neede haue a long spooone,
Or els full smale will be his fare :
Yet a proper Gentleman I am of truthe
Yea that may yee see by my long side gounne,
Yea, but what am I, a Scholer, or a scholemaister, or els som youth.
A Lawier, a studient or els a countrie cloune
A Brumman, a Baskit maker, or a Baker of Pies,
A flesh or a Fishmonger, or a sower of lies :
A Louse or a louser, a Leeke or a Larke :
A Dreamer a Drommell, a fire or a sparke :
A Caitife, a Cutthrote, a creper in corners,
A herbraine, a hangman, or a grafter of horners . . .
But yet Haphazard, be of good cheere,
Goe play and repast thee man, be mery to yeere :
Though vittaile be dainty and hard for to get.
Yet perhaps a number will die of the swet,
Though it be in hazard, yet happely I may,
Though mony be lacking, yet one day go gay.

There is something of an Autolycan spirit in the last lines. Nevertheless, while the author's heart is in this character the morality tradition keeps him true to a moral aim ; Justice, Reward, and Memorie enter as visualized abstract forms at the close of the play, and Haphazard goes gaily to his doom :

Must I needes hange, by the gods it doth spight me,
To thinke how crabbedly this silke lase will bite me :
Then come cosin cutpurs, come runne haste and folow me,
Haphazard, must hange, come folow the lyuerie.

Calisto and Melebea is equally moral, the ending of the Spanish Celestina having been changed, but displays again the author's love of less serious things. The story, told in seven-line stanzas, tells how Calisto is enamoured of Melebea; he confides in his servant Sempronio, who arranges to see the bawd Celestina. The last mentioned argues with Melebea, who is about to comply, when her father, Danio, enters to narrate a dream he has had. In horror Melebea confesses her evil thought, and the play ends with exhortations to virtue. The best parts are not the 'moral' portions, but the conversations of Celestina and Melebea. The former is a kind of prototype of Juliet's nurse. She can tell a story lengthily and with evident gusto:

DEVELOPMENT OF PROFESSIONAL DRAMA

Now the blessing that our lady gaue her sone
That same blessing I gyue now to you all . . .
Sempronio for me about doth inquire
And it was told me I shuld haue found hym here
I am sure he wyll come hyther anone
But the whylyst I shall tell you a prety game
I haue a wench of Sempronios a prety one
That soiornyth with me Elecea is her name
But the last day we were both ny a stark shame
For . . . she lovyth one Cryto better or as well
Thys Cryto and Elicea sat drynkyng
In my hous and I also makynge mery
And as the deuyll wold farr from our thynkyng
Sempronio almost cam on vs sodenly
But then wrought I my craft of bawdery
I had Cryto go vp and make hym self rome
To hyde hym in my chamber among the brome
Then made I Elicea syt down a sowynge
And I wyth my rok began for to spyn
As who seyth of sempronio we had no knowynge
He knokkyd at the dore and I lete hym in
And for a countenaunce I did begyn
To catch hym in myne armys and seyde see see Who kyssyth me Elicea and wyll not kys the Elicea for a countenaunce made her greuyd
And wold not speke but styll dyd sowe Why speke ye not quod sempronio be ye meuyd
Haue I not a cause quod she no quod he I trow
A traytour quod she full well dost thou know
Where hast thou ben these .iii. days fro me
That the impostume and euyl deth take the Pease myne Elicea quod he why say ye thus Alas why put you your self in this wo

BRITISH DRAMA

The hote fyre of loue so brennyth betwene vs
 That my hart is wyth yours where euer I go
 And for .iii. days absens to say to me so
 In fayth me thynkyth ye be to blame
 But how hark well for here begynnyth the game
 Cryto in my chamber aboue that was hyddyn
 I thynk lay not easily and began to romble Sempronio hard that and askyd who was within Aboue in the chamber that so dyd Jomble who quod she a louer of myne may hap ye stomble
 Quod he on the trewth as many one doth
 Go vp quod she and loke whether it be soth
 Well quod he I go nay thought I not so
 I sayd com sempronio let this foole alone
 For of thy long absens she is in such wo
 And half besyde her self and her wyt ny gone
 Well quod he aboue yet there is one
 Wylt thou know quod I ye quod he I the requere
 It is a wench quod I sent me by a frere. . . .
 Then he laught ye quod I no mo wordes of this
 For this tyme to long we spend here amys.

Taken though Celestina may be from a Spanish source, we see here the raciness and the vigour of the English author. Melebea, too, is well drawn. Her first disgust at Celestina and then her half-playful acceptation of the latter's arguments show some skill in management of character.

In Damon and Pithias we approach something more elaborate. The precise 'moral' here has disappeared into the background, and we are presented with a pleasant little romantic story wherein Damon and Pithias with their faithful but outspoken servant Stephano arrive at Syracuse. Damon unwittingly allows himself to give cause for suspicion to Carisophus, a parasite and informer, and is accordingly condemned to death. On his begging leave of the monarch Dionysius to return to Greece, the latter consents, if Pithias will stand his pledge. On the day appointed, Damon not appearing, Pithias is about to be slain when Damon rushes in; the King is so affected that he takes them both into his Court. The story is added to by the pleasant humours of the kind-hearted but self-seeking philosopher Aristippus, by the pranks of the merry serving-boys Jacke and Wyll, and by the country manners of Grime the colyer. There is a sparkle in this piece that shows Master Edwards to have been the forerunner of Lyly in more ways than one.

DEVELOPMENT OF PROFESSIONAL DRAMA

*Fulgens and Lucre*s may be taken as the last typical example of this series. The Induction to this piece, with the two boy-figures, at the very start claims our attention, and the story itself is one that arouses our interest. The maiden Lucrece (or Lucre) is confronted with two lovers, Publius Cornelius, a gallant and an aristocrat, and Gayus Flaminius, lower born but of virtuous mind. The plot of the play concerns the wooing of Lucrece by these two, with her final decision to give her hand to the second. In this and in the former play we reach a stage intermediate between the morality or the moral-drama of the Apilus and Virginia type and the full, completely formed tragedy and comedy of the University Wits. Already in Damon and Pithias we find wit and conceited fun as well as interesting characterization; in *Fulgens and Lucre*s, as in Promos and Cassandra, we discover the introduction of romantic love. The real service of the authors of these plays, however, to the development of the drama lies in the driving away of the extraneous 'moral' and the consequent disappearance of abstract types and characters.

(iv) THE DEVELOPMENT OF TRUE COMEDY

There can be no question but that these plays proved immensely popular; they may have offended the severer classicists such as Sidney, but they were nevertheless of the dramatic type favoured and demanded by the masses of English people. Their popularity extended from the Court of Elizabeth to the meanest of the Queen's subjects. The humanists, on the other hand, were not prepared to give up the struggle without an attempt to show their contemporaries what ought to be liked, and from their efforts came the first true English comedy and the first true English tragedy. Of the former type of drama two works have attained to a well-merited fame, the comedy by "Mr S." described as A Ryght Pithy, Pleasaunt and merie

BRITISH DRAMA

Comedie: Intytuled Gammer gurtons Needle (c. 1550-3; printed 1575) and Nicholas Udall's Roister Doister (c. 1553-4; printed 1566). While, in point of date, Gammer Gurton's Needle takes priority, it must be noted that this was a University play and consequently somewhat out of the regular movement in dramatic form; Udall's play remains the first complete English comedy designed for public performance in London.

In this drama we may clearly trace the impression of two forces—that of the comic interlude and that of Terence. Already the works of the Latin playwright had crept into an English dress; they were being read in the original by the humanists and studied in translation by those whose Latinity was too weak to permit them to gain the full flavour of the original. In general, we may say that the influence of Terence tended in two directions. From his plays the new dramatists learned how to work out a full plot. Roister Doister is no mere actionless farce or scanty debate, but a comedy full of incident and of adventure, well ordered and well planned. Not only in form, however, did Terence influence the rising English drama. In depiction of character too he taught men many intimate secrets. The witty lovers, the testy old fathers, the intriguing servants of sixteenth-century comedy all take their rise directly from his example. Roister Doister, the hero of this particular play, is after all only a transformed replica of the bombastic miles gloriosus of Roman times. A mere imitation of Terence, on the other hand, might well have led toward nothing but dullness and insipidity, and happily the English playwrights of the sixteenth century had their own native dramatic tradition on which to fall back. Comparing Udall's work with any of the plays of Shakespeare, we may consider it crude and uninteresting; yet the vis comica is there in however disguised a form. There is a freshness in the dialogue which shows that the author had heard or studied the rough yet bright and interesting conversations of the earlier interludes. There is a natural raciness in the work which is independent of classical imitation. The morality tradition, also, had taught Udall something. If Roister Doister himself is a representative of the classic miles gloriosus, Matthew Merygreeke is simply the old Vice of native English tradition given an English name and attendant, not on a devil, but on a swaggering braggart.

DEVELOPMENT OF PROFESSIONAL DRAMA

Gammer Gurton's Needle displays in the main the same features with the addition of even more realistic touches. The story of the play is of the slightest, all hinging upon the loss of a needle and on the consequent intrigues and jealousies, yet the play has an enduring charm. The rustic setting, the rural types speaking many of them in country dialect, and the naturalistic dialogue all show us that this "Mr S.," the author of the play, has not forgotten to look at life as well as at Terence. Here, we may say, the modern period of comedy has well begun.

It was not, however, only Terence who served as a model for the English playwrights in their search for form. The Renaissance had produced in Italy two schools of drama, the commedia erudita and the commedia dell'arte, both based theoretically on classic example. Unquestionably the latter influenced English comedy both in the sixteenth and in the seventeenth centuries; and the former provided at least some suggestions to the early writers. For the introduction of this commedia erudita we must look to George Gascoigne, an author notable for his inventive powers rather than for any great literary capability. The Italian comedy of intrigue first made its appearance in Supposes (Gray's Inn, 1566), an adaptation of Ariosto's I Suppositi, a rendering of particular importance not only for its subject-matter, but also for its medium. It is the first prose comedy in English. This question of medium is one of particular significance. In medieval days all the dramas were penned in some one or other stanza-form; the interludes and the moralities were all rimed. The movement to blank verse marked an endeavour to secure a style that should be more realistic and consequently more fitting for the exposition of ordinary comic characters and episodes, while the final step was taken by Gascoigne when he discarded altogether the fettering restrictions of metrical form. Most of the romantic dramatists of a later date retained the verse form for the greater portion of their plays, as expressing more fully their desires, but almost always that verse was intermingled with prose of a more realistic kind. Akin to this play of Supposes, but in verse, may be noted the anonymous Bugbears (extant in manuscript), an adaptation of A. F. Grazzini's La Spiritata—another attempt to popularize the Italian comedy in England. These two dramas, to judge from the titles of other plays preserved in the Revels Accounts, were merely two out of a large number of similar translations or adaptations from the Italian.

BRITISH DRAMA

(v) SENECA TRAGEDIES AND CHRONICLE HISTORY PLAYS

In comedy there is not such a direct break between the classic and romantic theories as there is in tragedy. After all, these versions or imitations from the works of Terence or of Italian writers could easily be appreciated by classicist and romanticist alike. The neo-classical writers forbade the intermixture of comedy and tragedy, it is true ; but the public could fully appreciate the spirit of a purely mirthful play. Both, moreover, realized that, after all, the basis of true comedy lies in nature ; the realistic touches in the first two English comic dramas amply prove this. In the realm of tragedy it was far otherwise. Here we find a distinct cleavage, for the neo-classicists demanded dignified rhetoric rather than free expression of emotion, narration rather than the display of action, static qualities rather than movement. The popular audiences were wholly on the side of lyricism, liberty, and action. They could discern no justification for the set of rules instituted by the severer among the critics. We discover, therefore, a complete break between the tragi-comedies written presumably for the more popular audiences and the neo-classical tragedies written for the spectators of a more humanistic type. From the very first there could be no doubt that the popular opinion was to win in the end. Not only do the neo-classical tragedies gradually disappear, but they themselves begin to take on elements borrowed from the popular drama.

DEVELOPMENT OF PROFESSIONAL DRAMA

The first tragedy of this type, indeed the first complete tragedy in English, is that of Ferrex and Porrex, better known as Gorboduc, the work of Thomas Norton and Thomas Sackville, acted in January 1562, and this effort was followed by Thomas Hughes' The Misfortunes of Arthur (Gray's Inn, 1588), Robert Wilmot's Tragedie of Tancred and Gismund (Inner Temple, 1567-8; known also as Gismond of Salerne), and George Gascoigne's Jocasta (Gray's Inn, 1566). The first three of these plays have similar characteristics. While all betray clearly their indebtedness to Seneca in style and in treatment of theme, it is noticeable that each one deals with what is virtually a 'romantic' subject. The story of Gorboduc is taken from Geoffrey of Monmouth, as is that of The Misfortunes of Arthur, while the plot of Tancred and Gismund, centring round a fatal love passion, is derived from Boccaccio's Decamerone. These facts are significant; apparently not even the most pronounced of the humanists dared altogether to depart from the native tradition.

Viewed in comparison with the tragedies of Shakespeare, Gorboduc, first of the series, seems dull, stilted, and unimpassioned, with obvious borrowings from Seneca's plays. Yet we find not only that the authors preserved a certain liberty, but that they had a moderate share of artistic talent. They deliberately banished the old chorus, and substituted for it allegorical dumb shows, taken apparently from Italian example, showing in this their consciousness of the demands of a newer age. In style, too, crude as their effort is, they displayed some skill and even strength in the management of their blank-verse lines. They had mastered, that is to say, the basis of form; all that was required for the fuller development of the drama was the introduction of some greater and higher beauty of rhythm.

The Misfortunes of Arthur, based in style and treatment on Seneca's Thyestes, calls for little attention save in regard to the neo-classical ordering of a thoroughly romantic theme. Tancred and Gismund, on the other hand, deserves notice for its thoroughly passionate plot, in which a lover visits his mistress by means of an underground cavern, eventually meeting his death at the hands of her father. Horror is introduced here at the close of the play when the maiden is presented with her lover's heart in a cup of gold. In style this tragedy marks no advance. The chill monotony of the choral verses and the insipidity of the στιχομυθία make the work but dull reading. The romantic playwrights had yet to teach the classicists that nothing truly dramatic could come from lines such as the following :

BRITISH DRAMA

Gismund. Oh syr these teares love challengeth as due.

Tancred. But reason sayth that it no whitt avayle

Gismund. Yet can I not my passions so subdue

Tancred. Your fond affections ought not to prevaile

Gismund. Who can but plaint the losse of such a one Tancred. Of mortall thinges no losse shuld seme so strange

Gismund. Such gemme was he as erst was never none.¹

At the same time, while we smile at the puerilities of verses such as these, we must remember that this neo-classic author not only taught the romantic poets how to form an ordered whole of a theme of passion, but passed on the rough basis of the Senecan form for Shakespeare's use in his early career. Jocasta is even duller and more monotonous than Tancred and Gismund; but the play has a decided value in the fact that it is an adaptation of an Italian original, Lodovico Dolce's Giocasta, even although the title-page declares it to be a translation from Euripides.

The Senecan style was destined to play a large part in the history of later tragic effort. Many writers strove to reproduce as faithfully as possible the rigidity of the classic stage, with chorus and all complete, as Kyd did in his Cornelia (1593; printed 1594); others, such as the author of The Lamentable Tragedie of Locrine (c. 1591; printed 1595), attempted to follow the lead of Sackville and Norton in adapting romantic material to classic treatment; still others, such as Kyd in The Spanish Tragedy, boldly fused

¹ The text is taken from the manuscript version entitled Gismond of Salerne.

DEVELOPMENT OF PROFESSIONAL DRAMA

Senecan and romantic methods together, introducing a new and more forceful type of drama. While the neo-classic style never flourished in England, we must bear in mind that it was the neo-classicists who taught the playwrights of the age form and dignity of expression.

One other main dramatic development of these transitional years has been mentioned—the elaboration of the historical play. Already we have seen how Bale in Kynge Johan was making use, however unhistorically, of an historical monarch in order to enforce a moral or religious precept; his example must have been followed by others, until writers arose daring enough to pen plays on English history for no acknowledged didactic aim. It is perfectly apparent that this movement was almost entirely on the popular side. There might be opportunity here for the introduction of some of the external features of the Senecan drama, but the unities of time and place had to be abandoned, and the subject-matter allowed, nay demanded, an amount of bustle and action far removed from the static calm beloved by the neo-classicists. Of these historical plays many must have been lost. Barely a dozen are extant, although from contemporary records we know that the type was popular. All of these, it may be observed, were written for the public stages, not for Court production or for performance at the Inns or the Temple. Many of the chronicle histories are well known because of their relationship to Shakespeare's work; The Troublesome Raigne of Iohn King of England (c. 1590; printed 1591), The First Part of the Contention betwixt the two famous Houses of Yorke and Lancaster (c. 1592; printed 1594), The True Tragedie of Richard Duke of Yorke (c. 1592; printed 1595), The True Tragedie of Richard the Third (c. 1590-4; printed 1594), The Famous Victories of Henry the fifth (c. 1588; printed 1598), and The True Chronicle History of King Leir (c. 1594; printed 1605) are each the basis of one of Shakespeare's plays. To these might be added The Raigne of King Edward the third (c. 1595; printed 1596) and The Famous Historye of the life and death of Captaine Thomas Stukeley (1596; printed 1605). Most of these plays are weak in construction and in characterization, but in nearly every one there is the presence of some marked poetical features or dramatic touches. They show the establishment upon the English stage of a type of drama in which the morality tradition, the Senecan model, and the interlude have all played their parts. They show the love of action and romantic incident, the passion for freedom of expression and for poetic dialogue, which is always to be associated with the rise and development of the Elizabethan drama.

BRITISH DRAMA

A backward glance at the growth of dramatic form as briefly described in this section reveals certain clearly traceable tendencies. We note first the elaboration of realism in comedy and in tragedy and the consequent casting off of the personified characters of the morality plays. On the other hand, there is the attempt to secure decorum and dignity on the part of the neo-classicists which makes certain dramas of this time, if not unreal, at least artificial in diction and in characterization. This struggle between the classicists and the dramatists holding to the native tradition colours the whole work of the period, and corresponds to two types of dramatic performance. The classical tragedies and comedies are nearly all confined to the Inns of Court or to the Universities; the more romantic plays are practically all associated with the popular stages. For long the humanists struggled; even Ben Jonson in the seventeenth century fondly hoped to oust the Hamlets and Othellos from the stage with his Sejanus and Catiline. The age, however, obviously wished for no trammels upon the theatre. Freedom, action, passion, the audiences desired, and these they found in the work of the romantic playwrights. A summary of the development of these years, therefore, displays several salient lines of dramatic progress: the classical tragedy, decorous and well ordered, but lacking in emotion and movement; the crude tragi-comedy, showing a mingling of many diverse elements in a somewhat chaotic form, but pointing the way, as in Promos and Cassandra, to the romantic comedy of Greene and Shakespeare; the historical play of a wholly novel type ; the true comedy, as in Roister Doister, uniting Terentian and English ideals ; and the cruder sort of farcical comedy seen in the native interludes of Heywood and his companions. The next chapter will show how, by the endeavours of a group of men who were the older contemporaries of Shakespeare, these types were fused into one.

DEVELOPMENT OF PROFESSIONAL DRAMA

CHAPTER IV

THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE PUBLIC THEATRES THE UNIVERSITY WITS

THE THEATRE IN THE LATE SIXTEENTH CENTURY

THE tracing of dramatic developments has already taken us to the nineties of the sixteenth century, a date when the theatrical activity in England was in full swing. By this time the actual form of the miracle stage had long been forgotten by Metropolitan audiences, and a new type of theatre had been evolved. The interludes seem to have been performed mainly in the halls of well-to-do patrons of the drama, possibly on a raised dais at one end of the room. The Court plays were also similarly arranged, with the addition of more spectacular and scenic elements. This was for the upper classes. For the populace in general inn-yards seem to have formed the first regular theatres since the time when the medieval crowds stood round the pageant in the village square. These inn-yards were usually square, with galleries running round the walls. Here it was that the actors hastily erected their stages of rough board and performed their interludes, and, later, their more elaborate plays. But such yards must soon have been found unsatisfactory, chiefly because of the lack of a permanent stage and the inconveniences attendant upon that want. We are not surprised, therefore, to find that the thought of building permanent structures for theatrical performances soon forced itself upon the actors and those interested in the companies. The first playhouse in London was erected in the year 1576 in Shoreditch, well out of reach of the civic authorities.

The reason for the location of this theatre is to be found in the composition of the companies of actors and in the Government's attitude toward play-performances in general.

ESTABLISHMENT OF PUBLIC THEATRES

For long the Court had had its regular bands of minstrels and players, holding peculiarly privileged positions; but with the growth of a more regular drama there naturally sprang into being countless bands of actors wholly unassociated with the Court, although usually attached to the service of a particular lord of the realm. The difficulty of dealing satisfactorily with these bodies of actors soon made itself felt, and as a consequence there was passed a law that all players not in the service of a lord should be treated as rogues and vagabonds. This, in reality, made little difference to the actors, as many peers were willing to sponsor companies of players who wore the regular liveries of retainers, but were independent and earned their own livings. The Queen's men, the Lord Admiral's men, the Lord Chamberlain's men, and a host of others were secure from interference so long as they held to the ordinary laws of the land. The civic authorities in London and elsewhere mainly looked upon this licensed playing as an unmitigated evil and a nuisance, and in London they made every effort in their power to prevent acting within the City boundaries. It is for this reason that the first theatres, the Theatre itself, the Rose, the Globe, the Fortune, the Swan, were built either in the Shoreditch area, convenient of access from the east yet outside the walls of London, or else on the Bankside, to the south of the Thames, a noted haunt for seekers of amusement, both legitimate and otherwise. Before the close of the sixteenth century the only acting that took place within the City was at Blackfriars, where a theatre had been built for the child players who became so popular in later years.

The theatres already mentioned, with the exception of the Blackfriars playhouse, were all designated by the title 'public' in contradistinction to the 'private' theatre at Blackfriars, and, later, to those at Salisbury Court and Drury Lane. The private theatre, which becomes of immense importance in the early seventeenth century, was roofed in, lit by artificial light, and attended normally by a better-class audience. The public theatre was open to the sky, performances there took place in broad daylight, and all classes intermingled in the yard or in the galleries. It is with this latter type of theatre that we are most concerned. Possibly no great thought was devoted to the designing of the first playhouse, and certainly later theatrical promoters were content to follow the general outlines of the buildings erected before their time. We shall be historically justified if we regard these theatres as the spontaneous expression of a natural love of dramatic shows, not based on any very profound determination on the part of actors or of managers to provide for the audiences the best and the most fitting accommodation. Fundamentally the designers of these public playhouses seem to have looked for a model to the inn-yard, although possibly some humanistic leanings may have given to them a few suggestions taken from the Roman amphitheatres. Their theatres, in any case, were round or octagonal,¹ with a stage set in the middle of a benchless open yard and tiers of galleries running round the entirety of the house. Over the stage was a small roof supported by pillars, and on top of all appeared a tiny turret, on which flew a flag to indicate that a play was in progress and from which a trumpeter announced to all the commencement of a performance.

BRITISH DRAMA

It is not necessary here to enter into the many debatable problems connected with the minutiæ of Elizabethan stage construction. A summary of generally accepted truths, in so far as these bear upon the structure of the plays, will be sufficient.

The main stage was open, with a curtain at the back and two or more doors, through which the actors entered. Not only did the 'groundlings' surround this platform, but gallants able to pay for the privilege sat on the stage itself. Two important consequences resulted from this. Firstly, no scenery as we know it could be introduced on the main stage. Primitive effects securable by the introduction of movable properties were all that the limitations allowed. A tree in a tub might symbolize a forest, a bed wheeled in might suggest a chamber, a flaring torch might suggest in the warmth of a June sun the darkness of a cavern, but beyond that nothing was possible. Having no obligation to consider the expense of scenery, the actor-managers did not require to reflect on the actual settings of plays; and the dramatists were free to make four or forty scenes to their plays as they wished. The structure of Elizabethan dramas, therefore, cannot be discussed on the standards of present-day theatrical art. Still further, the absence of scenery made necessary the introduction of a large amount of explanatory reference. The audience had to be told it was dark, had to be let into the secret that this was a hall, a garden, a castle, a dungeon, and to this we owe a great deal of the sheer poetry of the late sixteenth-century and early seventeenth-century drama. Such description, rendered necessary by the special conditions of the Elizabethan theatre, would be manifestly artificial and out of place in modern plays designed for a 'picture-frame' stage. The second consequence of the fact that the audience so surrounded the actors was that more intimacy between the two was possible than nowadays. The audience came, as it were, into the drama. The clothes of the players were frequently Elizabethan clothes, if a trifle more resplendent, so that the illusion was perhaps greater than it could ever be in our own time, and this led toward the elaboration of certain dramatic conventions which to-day seem artificial and weak. The soliloquy is one of these. For an actor to mouth out a soliloquy in a large theatre from behind the footlights so that his words may carry to the galleries is purely artificial; but for an actor in this Elizabethan playhouse to utter his thoughts as it might be to his intimate friends surrounding him is no such absurdity. So too with the aside. The aside in modern times has to be shouted, and the actor can never get across the footlights to say it. In the sixteenth-century playhouse it must have been perfectly simple for the performer to turn for a moment to the groundlings near him and softly whisper his inner conviction or determination.

¹ The Fortune, erected at a later date, was square.

ESTABLISHMENT OF PUBLIC THEATRES

This main stage, however, by no means exhausted the possibilities of the Elizabethan theatre. At least two other portions were utilized by the actors, the rear stage and the balconies. Behind the back wall lay a smaller inner room, possibly a curtained part of the tiring-house, in which occasionally scenes were enacted. This portion of the stage could at will be 'discovered' by drawing the curtain, and here property of various sorts might be set while action was proceeding on the outer stage. In this inner room Ferdinand and Miranda would be seen playing their innocent game of chess; it could pass for a cave, a bedroom, a shop, at the desire of the players. While nothing can be said for the purely fanciful theory which supposes that all Elizabethan plays were formed on a plan which made action on the main stage and action on the inner stage alternate, the use of this room behind the curtain with its possibilities for stage settings must not be lost sight of when we study the Elizabethan drama. The other locality utilized by the actors stood above the stage proper. It has already been noted that galleries ran round the entirety of the house, and that portion of the lower gallery which passed over the stage proper seems frequently to have been used by the players as well as by the audience. One section of it no doubt housed the musicians: it was the "musique room"; but another served for Juliet's balcony, for the walls of Calais, or for a battlement of the Tower. The stage direction, so often to be met with in the original texts, bidding the characters "Enter above" invariably applies to this balcony over the stage. In the balcony were evidently real windows, which could be opened and shut at will, and the doors below could be regarded as street doors leading to a house, the first floor of which was the gallery itself. It is only by an understanding of these three stages and their constant use by the actors that we can gain a true appreciation of Elizabethan stagecraft.

BRITISH DRAMA

Finally, a word must be said concerning the retention of older conventions borrowed from the mystery tradition. In many ways the Elizabethan theatre was symbolic, in that the audience were prepared to accept not complete realism, but a suggestion of realism, in the effects produced on the stage. One or two examples may serve to make this clear. A situation frequently occurs in plays where one character is presumed to be in a room, pursued by his enemies. He dashes in and locks a door while his foes clamour without. On the Globe stage quite obviously this had to be done conventionally. All the doors leading to the stage could not be locked, and the spectators were content if but one was closed. The others were put for the moment out of mind. So, too, the old convention whereby characters could walk over or round the stage and thereby be supposed to travel many weary leagues was retained in a slightly altered form. A dramatist, for instance, wishes to show two characters in Rome and then to foreshorten their journey to Venice. He bids them go out at one door and enter at another, and the voyage is done. Costume, also, must often have been symbolical. Just as characters in the mysteries or moralities could enter upon the stage in "a suit to go invisible in" and be presumed non-existent by the audience, so Ariel in The Tempest could vanish from mortal gaze by a similar means. It is natural that costume should be still one of the chief things regarded by the actors. We have already seen from the records of the mystery plays how precious these costumes were for medieval players and spectators; the invaluable records of Philip Henslowe preserved at Dulwich College prove the wealth of the Elizabethan companies in the same respect.¹ If the actors did not expend much money on scenery they certainly expended it on clothes. Thus in an "Inventory of the goods of my Lord Admeralls men, tacken the 10 of Marche in the yeare 1598" we read of certain rich stuffs "gone and loste," including j orange taney satten dublet, layd thyecke with gowld lace . . .

ESTABLISHMENT OF PUBLIC THEATRES

j payr of carnatyon satten Venesyons, layd with gold lace . . .
Harey the fyftes dublet
Harey the fyftes vellet gowne and in another inventory of "Clownes Sewtes and Hermetes Sewtes" we hear of j senatores gowne, j hoode, and 5 senetores capes j sewtte for Nepton . . .

¹ For Henslowe's Diary and the accompanying papers see the excellent edition prepared by Dr W. W. Greg.

BRITISH DRAMA

iiij Herwodes [? heralds'] cottes, and iij sogers cottes, and j green gown for Maryan [i.e., Maid Marian] vj grene cottes for Roben Hoode, and iiij knaves sewtes . . .
The Mores lymbes,¹ and Hercolles lymes . . .
Eves bodeyes [bodice] . . .
j payer of yelow cotton sleves, j gostes sewt, and j gostes bodeyes.

So, also, we learn of other costumes in the possession of the Lord Admiral's men :

j payer of whitte saten Venesons cut with coper lace
j ash coller satten doublett, lacyd with gold lace j peche coller satten doublett . . .
j Mores cotte . . .
j payer of French hosse, cloth of gowld
j payer of cloth of gowld hosse with sylver paines . . .
Tamberlynes cotte, with coper lace . . .
Tamberlanes breches, of crymson vellvet. . . .

The list is a lengthy one, and shows the riches in this respect of the sixteenth-century companies. Ere leaving this subject it may be of interest to note a few of the 'properties' in the possession of the same company in 1598. We read there of j rocke, j cage, j tombe, j Hell mought.

The hell-mouth is clearly a relic of the mystery plays. The rock appears in many dramas, and the cage was no doubt Bajazet's cage in Tamburlaine. The inventory continues :

j tome of Guido, j tome of Dido, j bed-steade . . .
ij marche panes, & the sittie of Rome.

This "city of Rome" is interesting. When we put it alongside of a later entry, "the clothe of the Sone and Mone," we may well ask ourselves whether primitive painted scenery of a kind may not have been occasionally used even in the sixteenth century. The other articles, however, are all either manual properties or properties of a material sort :

j globe, & j golden scepter ; iij clobes [clubs] . . .
j gowlden fleece ; ij rackets ; j baye tree . . .
j wooden canepie ; owld Mahemetes head . . .
Ierosses [Iris's] head, and raynbowe ; j littell alter.

¹ Malone suggests these were Aaron's limbs for Titus Andronicus.
'Hercolles' is Hercules.

THE UNIVERSITY WITS

viiij viserdes ; Tamberlyne brydell ; j wooden matook.
Cupedes bowe, and quiver . . .
j bores head & Serberosse [Cerberus] iij heades . . .
ij mose [moss] banckes, & j snake . . .
Mercurus wings ; Tasso picter ; j helmet with a dragon ; j shelde, with iij lyones ; j elme bowle . . .
iij tymbrells ; j dragon in fostes [Faustus] j lyone ; ij lyon heades ; j great horse with his leages [legs] ;
j sack-bute . . .
j poo pes miter.
iij Imperial crownes ; j playne crowne.
j gostes crowne . . .
j cauderm [cauldron] for the Jewe [in The Jew of Malta].

Many of these properties were evidently designed especially for plays of Marlowe and Greene, and these lists of Henslowe, with their many references to Tamburlaine and Dr Faustus and The Jew of Malta, fitly introduce us to the work of the University Wits.

(ii) THE UNIVERSITY WITS ; LODGE, NASHE, AND PEELE

In dealing with the work of this group of men it will be necessary to bear in mind the somewhat chaotic condition of the drama that preceded them. The classicists had form, but no fire ; the popular dramatists had interest, but little sense of form. Drama, that is to say, was struggling between a well-formed chill and a structureless enthusiasm. The great merit of the University Wits was that they came, with their poetry and their passion and their academical training, to unite these two forces and thus to give to Shakespeare a pliable and fitting medium for the expression of his genius. All these men, with the doubtful exception of Kyd, had had a training at one of the Universities. Robert Greene (1558-92) took his B.A. at Cambridge in 1578 and his M.A. in 1583 ; Thomas Lodge (c. 1557-1625) entered Trinity College, Oxford, in 1573, taking his B.A. in 1577 ; John Lyly (c. 1554-1606) matriculated at Magdalen College, Oxford, in 1571, securing his B.A. in 1573 and his M.A. in 1575 ; Christopher Marlowe (1564-93) matriculated at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, in 1581, took his B.A. in 1584 and his M.A. in 1587; Thomas Nashe (1567-c. 1601) went to St John's College, Cambridge, in 1582, and was awarded his B.A. in 1586; George Peele (c. 1557-96) entered Broadgates Hall, Oxford, in 1571 and Christ Church in 1574, taking his B.A. in 1577 and his M.A. in 1579. Thomas Kyd (1558-94), although he had a training at Merchant Taylors School, does not seem to have attended any university. His relations with the others, no less than his interest in Seneca, nevertheless entitle him to be considered in this group. Nearly all these men contributed to literature other works besides plays. Lyly gave a new prose style in Euphues; Nashe wrote his picaresque novel Jacke Wilton; Lodge produced the fanciful Rosalynde, and Greene the romantic Menaphon. Practically all, too, are alike in living peculiarly Bohemian lives in the Grub Street of their day. Marlowe died in a tavern brawl from a poniard wound; Greene spent his last hours in writing a penitential Groatsworth of Wit bought with a Million of Repentance; Lodge, according to Gosson, became "little better than a vagrant, looser than liberty, [and] lighter than vanity itself"; Lyly is spoken of as "Vicemaster of Pauls and the Foolemaster of the Theatre"; Nashe seems to have roystered it in the usual manner, and Peele's Merry Conceited Jests no doubt give an indication of that author's life. As for Kyd, we know how he got into trouble with Marlowe in the year 1593 for writing certain "atheistic" papers and was arrested on suspicion of having penned some "loud and mutinous libels." They were all Bohemians, careless, sometimes ungodly, heavy drinkers, acquainted with sin; but they gave to us the towering blank verse of Tamburlaine, the lovely romance of Friar Bacon, the insight into character of Dr Faustus. Whatever they were in actual life they laid a sure basis for the English theatre.

BRITISH DRAMA

It may be best here to take those who have given least to the stage, reserving the criticism of Greene, Lyly, Kyd, and Marlowe to the last. Lodge has left nothing save The Wounds of Ciuill War (c. 1588; printed 1594) and a portion of A Looking Glasse for London and England (c. 1590; printed 1594), a play written in collaboration with Greene. The latter play is interesting as a late relic of a morality drama, but it contains hardly anything that is new. Nor does the former rise above mediocrity. Lodge, while he has a decided power over the lyric and a charm in his fictional art, gave practically nothing to the theatre. In this respect he is the least of the University Wits. Nashe has left very little more than Lodge—only his comedy of Summers last will and Testament (1592; printed 1600) along with a not quite determinable share in Dido survive, although we know that he took part in writing the unfortunate Isle of Dogs (non-extant) in 1597. It is peculiar that the one play preserved to us should also be cast in something of the morality tradition, although it is modified by the free introduction of realistic comedy and satirical references. Nashe is another of this group more important for his work in fiction than for his dramas.

THE UNIVERSITY WITS

Besides three or four lost plays, and a suggestion of his pen in upward of a dozen dramas of the late sixteenth century, five works by Peele have been preserved—The Araygnement of Paris A Pastorall (printed 1584), The Battell of Alcazar (c. 1589; printed 1594),¹ The Famous Chronicle of King Edwarde the first (printed 1593), The Love of King David and Fair Bethsabe (c. 1593; printed 1599), and The Old Wines Tale. A pleasant conceited Comedie (c. 1592; printed 1595). These form a surer basis for judging the author's work as a playwright than was given us in the case of Lodge or of Nashe, and over and above these regular plays there are besides one or two entertainments which cast some further light on his power as a dramatic poet. As is evident, Peele's theatrical work is diverse in character. A pastoral, a romantic tragedy, a chronicle history, a kind of mystery play, and a romantic literary satire show clearly the breadth of his mind and the range of his genius. In all of them we note a high level of poetic attainment. His ¹ On the problems connected with the relationship between the printed text of this play and the manuscript 'plot' see W. W. Greg's Two Elizabethan Stage Abridgements: The Battle of Alcazar and Orlando Furioso (Malone Society, 1922).

BRITISH DRAMA

verse at times has caught something of the Marlovian melody, as in the last scene of King Edward I :

Gloster thy King is partner of thy heauiness,
Although nor tongue nor eies bewraie his meane,
For I haue lost a flowre as faire as thine,
A loue more deare, for Elinor is dead,
But since the heauenlie ordinance decrees,
That all thinges change in their prefixed time,
Be thou content and beare it in thy breast,
Thy swelling grieve as needes I must mine,
Thy Ione of Acon and my Queen deceast,
Shall haue that Honor as beseemes their state.
You peeres of England, see in roiall pompe,
These breathles bodies be entombed straight,
With tried colours couered all with blacke,
Let Spanish steedes as swift as fleeting winde, Conuaie these Princes to their funerall.

At other times it catches a new note of quiet romanticism which comes closer to the music of Greene. At his best he rises to a perfect height of lyric diction, as in the oft-quoted lines in his first play :

Not Iris in her pride and brauerie,
Adornes her arche with such varietie :
Nor doth the milke white way in frostie night,
Appeare so faire and beautifull in sight :
As done these fieldes, and groues, and sweetest bowres,
Bestrewed and deckt with partie collord flowers.
Alonge the bubling brookes & siluer glyde,
That at the bottome doth in sylence slyde,
The waterie flowers and lillies on the bankes,
Like blazing cometes burgen all in rankes :
Vnder the Hathorne and the Poplar tree,
Where sacred Phæbe may delight to be :
The Primerose and the purple Hyacinthe,
The dayntie Violet and the holsome Minthe :
The dooble Daisie, and the Couslip queene
Of sommer floures, do ouer peere the greene :
And rounde about the valley as ye passe,
Yee may ne see for peeping flowers the grasse.

Poetry, however, brilliant as it may be, does not produce drama, and we note in Peele a certain weakness in constructive power. His plots are decidedly slight, and he does not seem to take sufficient care in the ordering of his scenes. Moreover, he allows poetry to enter into scenes from which it ought to be excluded. In David and Bethsabe, for example, Absalon is hanged by the hair. In this uncomfortable situation one would hardly look for well-ordered blank-verse utterance from him, but Peele cannot resist the temptation to indulge in his favourite métier ; cries Absalon :

THE UNIVERSITY WITS

What angrie angel sitting in these shades,
Hath laid his cruell hands vpon my haire,
And holds my body thus twixt heauen and earth ?
Hath Absalon no souldier neere his hand,
That may vntwine me this vnpleasant curle,
Or wound this tree that rauisheth his lord ?
O God behold the glorie of thy hand,
And choisest fruit of Natures workemanship,
Hang like a rotten branch vpon this tree,
Fit for the axe, and ready for the fire.
Since thou withholdst all ordinarie helpe
To lose my bodie from this bond of death,
O let my beautie fill these sencelesse plants,
With sence and power to lose me from this plague,
And worke some wonder to preuent his death,
Whose life thou madst a speciall miracle.

When all is said and done, it is Peele's comedies that will prove his most lasting claim to fame. The early pastoral exists for no plot, but for its beauty of romantic wording, and The Old Wives' Tale has a perfect charm of romantic humour. It is in the development of that particular type of humour which was later graced by Shakespeare that Peele proves himself greatest. Like Shakespeare he can induce laughter of a peculiarly mellowed sort by the juxtaposition of reality and romance, and he can create an atmosphere which unites these two worlds in one harmony. In The Old Wives' Tale Antic, Frolic, and Fantastic enter lost in a forest ; Clunch, coming in with a lantern and a candle, takes them to his cottage. There Madge, his wife, starts telling a fairy-tale, when suddenly the characters of the tale take visible shape and enact their story before the cottagers. Into this purely romantic fantasy Peele succeeds in introducing an amount of literary satire, Gabriel Harvey's attempts at Latinized verse in English being subjected to particularly severe ridicule. This is the first dramatic literary satire in English ; it is one of the completest expressions of romanticism in the sixteenth century outside of the works of Shakespeare himself.

BRITISH DRAMA

(iii) MARLOWE

The four greater members of the group of University Wits remain for consideration ; each of these deserves a far more detailed attention than could be devoted to Lodge, Nashe, or Peele. It may be well to start with the most individual and the most talented of the pre-Shakespearians, Christopher Marlowe. Of his work several well-known plays have been preserved : Tamburlaine the Great (c. 1587 ; printed 1590), The tragicall History of D. Faustus (c. 1588 ; printed 1604 and 1616), The Famous Tragedy of the Rich Jew of Malta (c. 1589 ; printed 1633), The troublesome raigne and lamentable death of Edward the second, King of England (c. 1592 ; printed 1594), The Massacre at Paris (1593 ; the one contemporary quarto is undated), and The Tragedie of Dido Queen of Carthage (c. 1593 ; printed 1594 as by Marlowe and Nashe). Besides these, Lusts Dominion ; Or, The Lascivious Queen was printed in 1657 as by Marlowe, but has been almost unanimously rejected as a work of his pen. Quite rightly it is the first four plays which have been hailed by enthusiasts as masterpieces of dramatic art. The Massacre at Paris is admittedly a poorly wrought and poorly written drama ; and Dido rarely rises above the levels of unimpassioned blank verse. Its sole interest lies in the presentation of the heroine, a presentation which takes on added significance when we consider the general lack of women characters in Marlowe's other plays.

Of the four greater dramas Tamburlaine, Dr Faustus, and The Jew of Malta stand together as displaying certain common characteristics all distinct from the ordinary tragic conventions of the time. These characteristics may best be discussed together, as a separate analysis of each individual play rather tends to obscure the unity of conception which dominates all three. In the first place we note the influence of Machiavelli, who, as we can see from the many references in contemporary literature, was more and more impressing himself upon the English public. Most heard of him by report, and took him as a symbol of all that was atheistical, immoral, and corrupt. In reality, Machiavelli is far from corrupt. His Prince is merely a summing up of regular Renaissance ideals of conduct; it is the culmination of that individualism which marks off the newly awakened Europe from the anonymity and communal ideals of the Middle Ages. Machiavelli had made a god of virtù, that quality in a man which drives him to find free and full expressions for his own thoughts and emotions. It is this virtù on which Marlowe has seized, not without some tremors of conscience in spite of his liberated mind. So he presents his heroes, Tamburlaine, Dr Faustus, and Barabas, overriding the ordinary moral codes of their times in an effort to find the complete realization of their particular ideals; and in The Jew of Malta he brings Machiavelli forward in person to speak the prologue to his tragedy. His words show a peculiar mingling of true love of Machiavelli's philosophy and half-terrified awe resulting from a contemplation of his "villainy."

THE UNIVERSITY WITS

Albeit the world thinke Macheuill is dead,
Yet was his soule but flowne beyond the Alpes. . . .
To some perhaps my name is odious,
But such as loue me gard me from their tongues,
And let them know that I am Macheuill,
And weigh not men, and therefore not mens words.
Admir'd I am of those that hate me most.
Though some speake openly against my bookes,
Yet will they reade me, and thereby attaine
To Peters Chayre: And when they cast me off,
Are poyson'd by my climbing followers.
I count Religion but a childish Toy,
And hold there is no sinne but Ignorance. . . .
O' th poore petty wites
Let me be enuy'd and not pittied!

The "poore petty wites" are those who possess not virtù and the passion for self-realization.

One important result of this insistence upon virtù must be noted. Call it what we please, virtù, ambition, will, tends to overlook class, and accordingly the dramas of Marlowe break away slightly from the more ancient medieval plan. For the Middle Ages tragedy was a thing of princes, and princes only ; for Marlowe it was a thing of individual heroes. Thus his Tamburlaine, king though he may be by the end of the drama, is born a peasant. The Jew is but a Mediterranean moneylender, and Faustus an ordinary German doctor and alchemist. The medieval conception of the royalty of tragedy is here being supplanted by the Renaissance ideal of individual worth. It is the union of the two which gives us the majesty of Macbeth and of Lear.

BRITISH DRAMA

In the same way, we may observe a change in Marlowe's dramas from the medieval theory that tragedy invariably represents a falling into misery or adversity from prosperity or happiness. Death comes to all Marlowe's tragic heroes, but the kernel of his dramas lies rather in the struggle of a brave human soul against forces which in the end prove too great for it. The medieval conception of tragedy was a distinctly moral one ; drama had to show this falling into adversity, and thereby inculcate a didactic lesson. There is no moral of this sort in Marlowe's plays. The interest centres wholly on the personality of the hero, and the pleasure derived from the drama comes from watching that personality, comes from the sense of greatness which that personality brings with it. This, again, is a secret which Marlowe taught to Shakespeare. Part, at least, of the tremendous impression we gain from witnessing Othello and Macbeth springs from the essential nobility of the heroes of these two plays. This is one of Marlowe's most outstanding contributions to the development of a truly august type of English tragedy. His main conception of serious drama—Renaissance virtù battling on to success and then falling unconquered before fate—is at the root of all the great seventeenth-century tragic activity ; only, Shakespeare made his figures more human and stressed more the fatal flaw in the greatness of their characters.

In other ways, too, Marlowe in these plays advanced far beyond the previous attempts at serious drama. Already by the time when Gorboduc appeared blank verse had taken the place of rime as the chief medium for tragic dialogue but that blank verse was still unformed, artificial, and monotonous. Marlowe it was who breathed into it the life-spirit of poetry. All his heroes are essentially poets in their nature, for they are all reflections of Marlowe's own personality. He seeks to conquer the impossible in drama, to find the complete expression for all his hopes and desires, and he can put that same passion into the ambition for earthly dominion, for power over the intangible, for limitless revenge. Tamburlaine is thus a poet in essence. He delights in all the gorgeousness of imperial trappings, and he catches at the colour of rich words.

80

THE UNIVERSITY WITS

Your Maiesty shall shortly haue your wish,
and ride in tryumph through Persepolis,

says Meander, and the monarch's reply is thoroughly characteristic :

And ride in tryumph through Persepolis ?
Is it not braue to be a King, Techelles ?
Vsumcasane and Theridamas,
Is it not passing braue to be a King,
And ride in tryumph through Persepolis ?

His unquenchable aspirations lead him into the most harmonious of melodies, as when he gives expression to that passion shared by all his fellows :

Nature, that fram'd vs of foure Elements,
Warring within our breastes for regiment,
Doth teach vs all to haue aspiring mindes :
Our soules, whose faculties can comprehend
The wondrous architecture of the world, and measure euery wandring Plannets course,
Still climbing after knowledge infinite,
and alwaies mouing as the restlesse Spheares,
Wils vs to weare our selues and neuer rest
Vntil we reach the ripest fruite of all, that perfect blisse and sole felicity,
the sweete fruition of an earthly crowne.

It is he too, who most clearly gives utterance to Marlowe's own love of the impossible in poetry, expressing for all time what must have been felt by poets since poetry first became an art, and what must ever be felt by poets to the end of Time :

BRITISH DRAMA

If all the pens that euer poets held
Had fed the feeling of their maisters thoughts,
And euery sweetnes that inspir'd their harts,
Their minds, and muses on admyred theames ;
If all the heauenly Quintessence they still
From their immortall flowers of Poesy,
Wherein, as in a myrrour, we perceiue
The highest reaches of a humaine wit ;
If these had made one Poems period,
And all combin'd in Beauties worthinesse,
Yet should there houer in their restlesse heads
One thought, one grace, one woonder, at the least,
Which into words, no vertue can digest.

Nor is Faustus far different. With him the passion takes the form of a desire to conquer the secret force of nature but his words have the same glow of enthusiastic rapture :

O what a world of profite and delight,
Of power, of honour, and omnipotence,
Is promised to the Studious Artizan ?
All things that moue betweene the quiet Poles
Shall be at my command : Emperors and Kings,
Are but obey'd in their seuerall Prouinces :
But his dominion that exceeds in this,
Stretcheth as farre as doth the mind of man :
A sound Magitian is a Demi-god,
Here tire my braines to get a Deity.

Marlowe is the poet of passion par excellence, and nowhere does he show his genius for high, astounding phrases so much as he does when he is speaking of the rapture of beauty. His verses take on a strange iridescence where the marvelling at the loveliness becomes confused with the rich sound of words loved for their own sake. This is especially true of Tamburlaine's cry over the dying Zenocrate :

Blacke is the beautie of the brightest day,
The Golden Ball of heauens eternall fire,
That daunc'd with glory on the siluer waues,
Now wants the fewell that enflam'd his beames,
And all with faintnesse, and for foule disgrace,
He binds his temples with a frowning cloud,

THE UNIVERSITY WITS

Readie to darken earth with endlesse night,
Zenocrate that gaue him light and life,
 Whose eyes shot fire from their luorie bowers,
 And tempered euery soule with liuely heat.
 Now by the mallice of the angrie skies,
 Whose iealousie admits no second mate,
 Drawes in the comfort of her latest breath,
 Al dasled with the hellish mystes of death.
 Now walke the angels on the walles of heauen,
 as Centinels to warne th' immortall soules,
 To entertaine diuine Zenocrate.
Apollo, Cynthia, and the ceaselesse lamps,
 That gently lookt vpon the loathsome earth,
 Shine downwards now no more, but deck the heauens,
 To entertaine diuine Zenocrate.
 The Christall springs whose taste illuminates,
 Refined eyes with an eternall sight,
 Like tryed siluer runs through Paradise,
 To entertaine diuine Zenocrate.
 The Cherubins and holy Seraphins,
 That sing and play before the King of Kings,
 Vse all their voyces and their instruments
 To entertaine diuine Zenocrate.
 and in this sweet and curious harmony,
 The God that tunes this musicke to our soules,
 Holds out his hand in highest maiestie
 To entertaine diuine Zenocrate.

It is equally true of Faustus' still better-known eulogy of Helen :

Was this the face that Launcht a thousand ships
 And burnt the toplesse Towers of Ilium ?
 Sweet Hellen make me immortall with a kisse ;
 Her lips sucke forth my soule, see where it flies.
 Come Hellen, come, giue me my soule againe,
 Here will I dwell, for heauen is in these lippes,
 And all is drosse, that is not Helena.
 I will be Paris, and for loue of thee,
 Instead of Troy shall Wittenberg be sack't,
 And I will combat with weake Menelaus,
 And weare thy colours on my plumed crest,
 Yea, I will wound Achilles in the heele,
 And then returne to Hellen for a kisse.
 O thou art fairer then the euenings aire,
 Clad in the beauty of a thousand starres :
 Brighter art thou then flaming Iupiter,

BRITISH DRAMA

When he appear'd to haplesse Semele :
More louely then the Monarch of the sky,
In wanton Arethusa's azure armes,
And none but thou shalt be my Paramour.

Before passing to glance at some of those dramatic elements wherein Marlowe proved his inferiority to Shakespeare, it were well to mark the great scene in Dr Faustus which, more than anything else, points out Marlowe's true greatness. All previous dramas, including Tamburlaine, had dealt with single-minded individuals. If a struggle in the heart of a hero was introduced, that struggle normally took the form which is to be seen in the morality plays—the struggle being symbolized by conflicting bodies of minor characters. In Dr Faustus Marlowe attempted something new—the delineation of a struggle within the mind of the chief figure. This struggle is certainly somewhat primitive in its expression, but it is a foretaste of those “inward characteristics” toward which, as Professor Vaughan has pointed out, drama in its development inevitably tends. Faustus, in this respect, is unquestionably the greatest tragic figure in sixteenth-century literature outside the work of Shakespeare.

However great Marlowe proved himself in poetry, he was, nevertheless, not a Shakespeare. He never quite succeeded in reaching the loftiest summits of tragic art, and this perhaps was more owing to certain features in his own character than to the fact that he died young. In structure we see that all these three plays are faulty. Dr Faustus and The Jew of Malta have assuredly come down to us in mutilated texts; but even their original form must have been weak. Tamburlaine has no unity except such as lies in the presence of the hero; Dr Faustus is largely a collection of heterogeneous scenes, loosely pinned together; The Jew of Malta opens well, but sinks into mediocrity toward the middle and close. With Marlowe we are in the presence of a distinctly passionate but unbalanced genius, a man lacking the serenity and the calm-eyed power which gave to Shakespeare a large part of his greatness. With his insistence upon the tremendous emotions of these supermen heroes, Marlowe, moreover, tended to lose sight of the minor figures in his tragedies. All his heroes, by their very greatness, stand alone. We have the feeling that they have no mortal force to fight against. They are lonely figures in a world of Lilliputians. This may be, to a certain extent, a characteristic likewise of the Shakespearian tragedy, but always Shakespeare has given more of individuality to his lesser figures than has Marlowe. Horatio, Cassio, Banquo, and Kent have independent existence such as Meander and Wagner never could have. This want of relief is particularly to be noted in the almost complete lack of women in Marlowe's plays. Zenocrate plays but a shadowy part in Tamburlaine; Helen is but a vision in Dr Faustus; and Abigail hardly calls for our sympathy in The Jew of Malta. Again, while tragedy may be, in the main, masculine in character, this lack proves the circumscribed limits of Marlowe's art. A similar deficiency is to be felt in the entirely serious tone of his plays. The comic scenes in Dr Faustus, we may presume, were not from his hand. His plays are all pitched on the one note, the note of enthusiasm and of tragic passion. Never does he show the breadth and the vision which Shakespeare displays in the gravediggers of Hamlet or the porter of Macbeth.

THE UNIVERSITY WITS

It is just possible, of course, that Marlowe would have flourished forth into a more comprehensive dramatist had his life been spared; and for this there is evidence in the play of Edward II. This obviously belongs to the chronicle-history tradition, and hence stands apart from the others. There are more human elements in it, although the virtù so noticeable in the earlier dramas makes its appearance here in the figure of Mortimer, who is opposed to the weak-willed King. There is an effort in this play at introducing more complexity in a theme of resolution and of irresolution, and some of the dialogue reaches a pitch of tragic excellence finer than any of the more gorgeous paragraphs of the preceding plays. As Edward lies in the misery of his prison his words have a tragically pathetic note which seizes upon the imagination:

BRITISH DRAMA

And there in mire and puddle haue I stood,
This ten daies space, and least that I should sleepe,
One plaies continually vpon a Drum,
They giue me bread and water being a King,
So that for want of sleepe and sustenance,
My mindes distempered, and my bodies numde,
And whether I haue limmes or no I know not,
O would my blood dropt out from euery vaine,
As doth this water from my tattered robes :
Tell Isabell the Queene, I lookt not thus,
When for her sake I ran at tilt in France,
And there vnhorst the Duke of Cleremont.

Nothing quite like this had been known in the earlier chronicle histories. Hardly too much may be said of Marlowe as a poet, as a pioneer, as a genius of unquestioned individuality and independence both of thought and of feeling.

(iv) KYD

If Marlowe was responsible for developing one type of tragedy Thomas Kyd is responsible for elaborating another. Of his works we possess the famous and notorious The Spanish Tragedie (c. 1589; printed without a date, and, with additions, in 1602), and Cornelia (unacted; printed 1594). In addition to these he has been credited with the authorship of an early Hamlet, which, however, recent research tends to attribute to Shakespeare himself. Cornelia hardly merits any close attention; its blank verse at times is fair, but it is after all only a translation of Robert Garnier's Senecan Cornélie (1574). The Spanish Tragedy, on the other hand, marks a distinct era in the development of English tragedy. This play was an instant success, capturing completely the hearts of the late sixteenth-century audiences, and retaining its popularity long into the seventeenth century. Its fame is attested to by allusion after allusion in the plays and the pamphlets of the time. This popularity, and the fact that it gave rise to a host of similar plays, including Shakespeare's Hamlet, makes it necessary to pause for a moment in order to gain an idea of those features in it which most affected the spectators of the time. The story is one of revenge. We are introduced in the first scene to the ghost of Andrea, the slain husband of Bellimperia. The latter falls in love with Horatio, who is strangled by Lorenzo, Bellimperia's brother. Horatio's father, Hieronimo, secures his revenge by means of a play within the play, and dies glorying in his deed. It may be noted here that the portions which deal with the painter first found in the quarto of 1602 are not by Kyd, but were added, perhaps by Jonson, who was paid for "adicyons" to the play in 1602, or, as some have thought, by Webster. In discussing the value of the drama we must treat these scenes as separate from the original play. What is it that contemporaries saw in this piece? In the first place they found a Senecan play adapted to popular requirements. There is plenty of action upon the stage; there is an interest in it which the neo-classical dramas normally lack; and at the same time there is evidence in the authorship of a man who has studied the classical stage and learnt its most telling features. On the whole, the play is well constructed, and Seneca's ghosts and revenge themes have freely been borrowed from. Kyd, too, knew the tastes of the audience, and his tragedy is, like Shakespeare's plays, full of strong external action. The stage effects are well managed; the murders are thrillingly committed; and the whole work rises at the end to a climax of interest in the play scene. In some ways The Spanish Tragedy appealed to a Grand Guignol audience, and gave something too to those who still retained faith in classical drama. This able presentation of the story reveals the difference between Kyd and Marlowe. None of Marlowe's plays are well constructed; Kyd knows the theatre so well that he can make fullest use of all the opportunities it has to offer. Kyd, moreover, was a poet in his own way, and, without being able to rival Marlowe in writing the high, astounding line, he succeeds in producing dialogue that is forceful and capable, such as, for example, those words of Bellimperia and Balthazar at the opening of Act II, Scene 2:

86

THE UNIVERSITY WITS

Bel. My hart (sweet freend) is like a ship at sea :
She wisheth port, where riding all at ease
She may repaire what stormie times haue worne,

BRITISH DRAMA

And leaning on the shore may sing with ioy
That pleasure followes paine, and blisse annoy.
Possession of thy loue is th' onely port,
Wherein my hart, with feares and hopes long tost,
Each howre doth wish and long to make resort,
There to repaire the ioyes that it hath lost,
And, sitting safe, to sing in Cupid's Quire
The sweetest blisse is crowne of loutes desire.

Bathazar and Lorenzo aboue.

Bal. O sleepe, mine eyes, see not my loue prophande ;
Be deafe, my eares, heare not my discontent ;
Dye, hart : another ioyes what thou deseruest.

Even these qualities, however, do not exhaust all the main features of Kyd's work. He had taken over the Senecan type as it appeared in Gorboduc ; he had made it thrillingly effective ; he had breathed into it the passion of fine blank verse ; but he did something more than that. He contributed a new type of tragic hero to the stage. The main characters in tragedy up to his time had been "afflicted princes" or grandiloquent supermen ; Kyd presented the hesitating type seen most magnificently in Hamlet, and allied that with madness, feigned and real. Hieronimo does not sweep to his revenge. He moves a step forward, hesitates, draws back, falls into a passion of indecision, and then completes his task. It was the subtlety of character delineation in Kyd's work which must most have appealed to the audiences of the time ; they realized that here was something for which they had been seeking.

(v) GREENE

The remaining pair of University Wits gave all their attention to the development of comedy. Robert Greene has left five plays : The Comickall Historie of Alphonsus King of Aragon (c. 1587 ; printed 1599), A Looking Glasse for London and England (written with Lodge c. 1590 ; printed 1594), The Honorable Historie of frier Bacon, and frier Bongay (c. 1589 ; printed 1594), The Historie of Orlando Furioso (c. 1591 ; printed 1594), and The Scottish Historie of Iames the fourth, slaine at Flodden. Entermixed with 88

THE UNIVERSITY WITS

a pleasant Comedie, presented by Oboram, King of Fayeries (c. 1591; printed 1598). The first two of these may be neglected here. Alphonsus is an amateur work and very reminiscent of Tamburlaine; the other play has already been glanced at briefly. Orlando Furioso, also, requires but scant attention. Its theme, taken from Ariosto, but highly embroidered with fanciful touches, and its treatment do not raise it above the ordinary levels of the time. In Friar Bacon, however, and in James IV Greene has, as many critics have realized, contributed much to the development of romantic comedy in England. Romance we have already seen gathering way in the morality-interlude type of drama; it is here by Greene raised to the true height of art. The plot of Friar Bacon is sad enough, with its complications and barren stretches, but out of it there emerge two or three notable features. The first and greatest is the love between Margaret and Lacy. The story of the play shows us Friar Bacon and Friar Bongay, or Bungay, rivalling each other in magic, and revealing, by means of a marvellous glass, events that are taking place elsewhere. This portion of the plot introduces the low comic character of Miles, Bacon's scholar, and a Devil, who runs off with the magician on his back. Alongside of these figures move Edward, Prince of Wales, and Lacy, Earl of Lincoln, both in love with Margaret, the keeper's daughter. We have thus three distinct worlds mingled together—the world of magic, the world of aristocratic life, and the world of the country. These, by his art, Greene has woven together into a single harmony, showing the way to Shakespeare when the latter came to write A Midsummer Night's Dream. The cardinal feature of the romantic comedy is precisely this interweaving of diverse moods and surroundings, where princes meet with clowns, and fairies with artisans, added to the presentation of a rural love, usually spiritual in essence. The same atmosphere is to be discovered in James IV. Here the Kings of England and of Scotland, surrounded by a group of courtiers, meet in the same play with Bohan, a melancholy Scot, and Oboram, or Oberon, King of the Fairies. Here too is introduced a theme of romantic love, with Dorothea, the best-drawn woman figure in sixteenth-century drama outside Shakespeare's comedies, as the heroine. The whole is fused into a unity by Greene's peculiar humour, cast over the entirety of the play. With Greene, then, we find even more fully elaborated that dramatic form in which realism and idealism meet, where elements apparently contradictory move in one common harmony.

BRITISH DRAMA

The indebtedness of the drama to Greene is by no means confined to this presentation of romantic settings. His verse has a quality of its own not to be despised. Although normally it has a prevailingly iambic movement and is heavily influenced by the blank verse of Marlowe, Greene permits himself some liberties in his handling of it. We not only have lines which in their strength and beauty recall the melodies of Shakespeare, as in Margaret's words :

Why thinks King Henries sonne that Margrets loue Hangs in the vncertain balance of proud time ?

but we find scattered through his verses interesting variations from the iambic pentameter norm. Such a line as shows an interesting attempt to secure a variety rarely to be found in the more regular melodies of Greene's companions.

Poring vpon dark Hecat's principles

In characterization, too, Greene's contribution to the drama of his age is noteworthy. He is one of the first to draw the Rosalinds and Celias of Elizabethan times. Margaret and Dorothea are excellent portraits of women conceived and depicted in that romantic light which shone on so many works of this period. These women are real ; yet they have some elements in them which seem ideal. Once more the two worlds meet. So, too, with Bohan of James IV, a character who seems the prototype of Jaques in As You Like It. There is in him at once realism and a certain touch of the romantic which makes him a fit if somewhat moody companion for Oberon.

THE UNIVERSITY WITS

(vi) LYLY

Finally we come to that poet who, in point of time, was the earliest of this group, John Lyly. More of his work has been preserved than of any of the others. His plays number eight in all: A moste excellent Comedie of Alexander, Campaspe, and Diogenes (1584), Sapho and Phao (1584), Gallathea (c. 1588; printed 1592), Endimion, The Man in the Moone (1588; printed 1591), Midas (1589-90; printed 1592), Mother Bombie (c. 1590; printed 1594), Loves Metamorphosis (c. 1590; printed 1601), and The Woman in the Moone (c. 1594; printed 1597). All of these are marked by similar features, features which serve to differentiate Lyly from the other University Wits. In the first place, unlike the rest, he looked to the Court for favour rather than to the spectators in the public theatres. Whereas his companions all wrote for the newly arising play-houses, Lyly's comedies were intended for the child actors in royal service. This makes his plays possess a tone and a delicacy lacking completely in the rougher and more bombastic pieces wrought for performance by adult players before the more unrefined audiences at the Theatre or at the Globe.

It is possible to classify these plays of Lyly's into several groups—those which are allegorical and mythical in tone, those which display realistic features, and those which mark the introduction of more or less historical features. Possibly the last group, exemplified in Campaspe, might be included in the first. As all Lyly's comedies, however, possess the same essential characteristics, it is unwise to consider the separate plays apart from the whole of his dramatic productivity.

It was Lyly who was largely responsible for the first elaboration of romantic sentiment. He found on the stage the abstractions of the moralities; he found also the crude comedy of realistic types. He found too the strict classical division of drama into particular forms—tragedy, comedy, and pastoral; and alongside of that he found the crude mingling of tragedy and of comedy as exemplified in the rough popular plays we have already considered. Deliberately he seems to have sought for some atmosphere or for some method of treatment which might harmonize these apparently antagonistic spheres of interest, an atmosphere which is reflected in the humour and romantic fancy we have noted in the works of Peele and of Greene. This romantic fancy is with him more idealistic than it is with the other two men, and makes his plays move on a plane somewhat removed from terrestrial existence; but his importance as the inaugurator of this style cannot be overestimated. There is in his comedies a mellowed spirit under which seriousness and laughter meet, a world of poetic fancy wherein the deities of classical mythology live and move by the side of the human figures.

BRITISH DRAMA

Separated as Lyly was from the neo-classicists in refusing to bow to the canon of sharply marked 'kinds' of dramatic poetry, he was at the same time thoroughly humanistic in his outlook. Terence taught him the technique which is displayed in his dramas, and the study of Greek myth led him into a strange realm with which but few Renaissance artists were acquainted. The best way of estimating Lyly's mythological pictures is by comparing him with Botticelli. In both we find the classic age seen through the eyes of romance. In both there are delicate colourings, a certain mellowed sadness, a linking of earth with the spirit world. Here are realism and classicism and romanticism welded into one.

In style Lyly's importance has long been appreciated by scholars, and the title of his early novel, Euphues, has contributed a special adjective to the terminology of literary types. In its most exaggerated form this euphuistic style is dull, monotonous, and uninteresting, wearying the reader with the endless antitheses, the continual flow of artificial metaphors; but this was what his age was seeking. It was at least artistic, in the broader sense of the word. For the first time, almost, men found a prose style which bore upon it the evident marks of conscious artistry. Instead of rough strength there is grace; instead of blundering periods there is a refinement of thought and of phrase. What Lyly did for comic prose dialogue may easily be seen from even the few following lines quoted from Mother Bombie:

THE UNIVERSITY WITS

Dromio. Now, if I could meete with Risio, it were a world of waggery.

Risio. Oh that it were my chance, Obuiam dare Dromio, to stumble vpon Dromio, on whome I doo nothing but dreame.

Dromio. His knauerie and my wit, should make our masters that are wise, fooles; their children that are fooles, beggers; and vs two that are bond, free.

Risio. He to cosin, & I to coniure, would make such alterations, that our masters should serue themselues; the ideots, their children, serue vs; and we to wake our wits betweene them all.

For the first time also men found a suitable blank verse for comedy. Marlowe's richness and bombast and glory was ill suited for the expressing of lighter sentiments, whereas Lyly's verse, delicate if artificial, could convey excellently the quickness of his thought and the humorous images constantly fleeting through his brain. This prose and this verse Lyly frequently mingled in his comedies, and the interweaving of the two corresponds to the two worlds of reality and of the ideal. The same fusion is to be discovered in As You Like It.

In his attempts at successful comic-character drawing Lyly made an important advance. He shows certainly in some plays the excessive influence of Terence, but he frequently shakes himself free from the presentation of merely imitative 'humours.' There is no question but that in Dromio of Mother Bombie, in Stellio, Accidius, and Silena we have relics of the Latin stage, but none of these are quite pure types. Each has a certain touch of individuality that removes the apparent artificiality of the character-drawing. Moreover, we find in Lyly the first hints of the union of 'humours' with romantic characteristics, or of the juxtaposition of 'humours' and of romantic types. In Mother Bombie this is to be seen in the rather charming figures of Mæstius and Serena, just as it is to be discovered in the lovers, Eumenides and Semele, of Endimion.

In studying Lyly's work it is important to remember that while, to a certain extent, he stands apart from the regular development of drama in his time, his influence was widespread. All men and women of culture started to converse in euphuistic style, and the commoners aped the aristocrats. His comedies proved popular, and Shakespeare, among others, deigned to take from them many suggestions. The device of the girl dressed as a boy, which gave to us the figure of Rosalind, is to be traced back to Lyly. The introduction of songs symbolical of the movement or mood of a particular comedy owes its popularity to him. In countless ways, large and small, he contributed to the development of the theatre of his time.¹

BRITISH DRAMA

(vii) OTHER DRAMATISTS OF THE LATE SIXTEENTH CENTURY

In carrying the development of comedy and tragedy up to the close of the careers of the University Wits we have reached chronologically the nineties of the sixteenth century, and we have discovered certain main lines of dramatic development. In tragedy there has been noted (1) the Marlovian type, in which the hero is a superman, battling with the gods, (2) the Spanish Tragedy type of revenge play, and (3) the chronicle history of varying moods and atmospheres. With these moves the neo-classical tragedy, as exemplified in Gorboduc, but destined to take no large share in the growth of English drama, as well as odd plays, of which Peele's David and Bethsabe is one, with no very decided characteristics. In comedy we discover (1) the rude realistic farce deriving its inspiration from the interlude tradition, (2) the imitations of Terence and of Plautus, generally realistic in character, (3) the purely fanciful comedies written by Lyly, and (4) the romantic comedies of a realistic-ideal type inaugurated by Greene. These by no means exhaust all the forms of drama in the later years of the sixteenth century, but they may be taken as guides in the further summary of tragic and comic endeavour.

¹ It is important to remember that a true appreciation of Lyly's work cannot be gained until the principle of his stage methods is understood. Lyly, writing for the Court, adopted the 'simultaneous' method abandoned in the public theatres, whereby several distinct localities appeared on the stage at once. In Mother Bombye, for example, there are seven doors, each representing a separate locality. In Campaspe there are three localities on the stage—Alexander's house, Diogenes' tub, and Apelles' shop. This simultaneous setting was in use in the time of the mystery plays, and disappeared in England during the seventeenth century.

THE UNIVERSITY WITS

In the meantime it may be well to glance briefly at a few independent plays, and at the work of one or two separate writers whose dramas are in some way to be associated with the activities of the University Wits. One of the most important of these plays is The Lamentable and True Tragedy of M. Arden of Feversham in Kent (c. 1590 ; printed 1592), the authorship of which was at one time given to Shakespeare, but is now usually accredited to Kyd or to one of his followers. Arden of Feversham introduces us to a new type of tragedy, the domestic type. Domestic tragedy of a sort is, of course, visible in some of the moralities. The presentation of Everyman (under whatever name he may pass) is essentially domestic, and the example of these primitive dramas was no doubt fostered by the popular nature of the English theatre and by the influence of Marlowe. The moving from royal themes to the world of ordinary life was indeed inevitable for the English stage, divorced in spirit from the fettering restraint of classical rules and precepts. Arden of Feversham, however, marks the first direct break with tradition, and that break takes two distinct lines. In the first place, there is a good deal of prose mingled with its blank verse, and the verse itself is as close to prose as the author could bring it. The whole atmosphere of the play, therefore, even apart from the realistic theme, is brought down from the loftier realms of the earlier tragedy. The theme itself is the second important feature. We are here presented not with a story of revenge carried on in the Courts of princes, not with the downfall of some imperial monarch, but with the somewhat sordid murder of a Mr Arden by his wife Alice. Nothing could have been more thoroughly shocking to an enthusiast for the classics, but we, looking back from the twentieth century, can see that herein lay one of the opportunities which the English drama had of freeing itself from external bonds, and of elaborating a perfectly novel type of tragic endeavour.

The work of one or two particular dramatists may also be considered here, and first that of Anthony Munday (c. 1553-1633), a peculiarly shadowy figure, who is slowly coming to his own. Very little of his work is known, yet Meres in 1598 styled him one of "the best for comedy" and considered him "our best plotter." It is almost certain that his influence may be traced in many works which now pass under the names of others. Of his extant plays we have three in all: John a Kent and John a Cumber (manuscript with date "Decembris 1596," but performed c. 1594), The Downfall of Robert, Earle of Huntingdon (1598; printed 1601), and The Death of Robert, Earle of Huntingdon (1598; printed 1601; written with Chettle). In addition to these we know that he had a share in writing Sir Thomas More, and two plays—Fedele and Fortunio (c. 1584; printed 1585) and The Weakest goeth to the Wall (c. 1599; printed 1600)—have, the first with some evidence, the latter almost certainly erroneously, been attributed to him. The chief feature in the three known plays is the romantic atmosphere, and this has led certain modern critics to give to Munday probably more than his due share of praise as a forerunner of Shakespeare. John a Kent is indeed an interesting drama, presenting as it does a theme very similar to that given by Greene in Friar Bacon, and filled with the same romantic colouring. The two magicians, as in Greene's play, work for the loves of Sidanen and Marian, and this is intermingled with low-comedy episodes, in which appear one "Turnop with his Crewe of Clownes" not unsuggestive of Bottom and the artisans of A Midsummer Night's Dream. The two parts of Robert, Earl of Huntingdon display the same passion for romance, and here we come to an interesting fusion of history and folklore. The endeavour to provide an historical background for the Robin Hood legends is of importance, and no doubt gave several ideas to Shakespeare when he came to write his history-comedies. With these plays might be noted two of a similar tone and atmosphere, A Pleasant Conceyted Comedie of George a Greene, the Pinner of Wakefield (c. 1592; printed 1599), and A Pleasant Commodie, Called Looke aboute You (c. 1598; printed 1600). The first of these has been attributed to Greene, but it is more probable that some episodes in the play were based on that dramatist's life. The comedy is not well constructed, and verges, as do many plays of the romantic type, upon the sentimental; but the introduction of folk-elements with the characters of Robin Hood, Maid Marian, and George a Greene gives it a lasting interest. From the difference in style between the Robin Hood and the Earl of Kendal portions it seems as if a primitive Robin Hood play had here been worked up with pseudo-historical material and the utilization of some gossip concerning the University Wit. Look about You shows a similar mingling of history and folklore, with an additional element of realism. In many diverse ways the path was being opened up for Shakespeare.

BRITISH DRAMA

THE UNIVERSITY WITS

With Munday is to be associated Henry Chettle, who, like his companion, wrote many plays (most of them now lost) in collaboration with others for old Henslowe. The only play of his own which has been preserved is The Tragedy of Hoffman or A Reuenge for a Father (c. 1602; printed 1631). This tragedy is well written, many of the scenes being couched in a vivid dialogue hard to forget, but the heaping of murder upon murder prevents the play rising above melodrama. The conception of Hoffman, however, ferociously intent upon executing wild vengeance on the slayers of his father, and himself brought to ruin by the ἀμαρτία of his love for Otho's mother, shows that Chettle had some idea of the true nature of tragedy. A somewhat similar tragedy is that of Alphonsus Emperour of Germany, not printed till 1654, but probably dating back to the nineties of the sixteenth century. On the title-page of the only quarto it is attributed to Chapman, but this most modern critics are inclined to reject; the Stationers' Register entry of 1653 gives it to one John Peele, and probably because of this Kirkman ascribed it to George Peele. The drama shows well the crude revenge motives beloved by the audiences of the time, added to pseudo-historical interest. Alphonsus is a monster of vice. In the first scene he poisons his Machiavellian secretary, Lorenzo de Cyprus, and hints to the latter's son, Alexander, that the true murderers are to be sought in the Electors of the German Empire. By this means he uses the youth as a tool to further his projects. An attempt on the life of Richard, Duke of Cornwall, fails, but the King of Bohemia is successfully poisoned. Hedewick, the daughter of the Duke of Saxon, and the bride of Edward, Prince of Wales, is ravished ; her father stabs her, believing her unfaithful. One after another the enemies fall, until in the end Alphonsus in a moment of fear confesses his crimes to Alexander. The latter makes him deny God and then stabs him to the heart. Here the elements of the horror tragedy are intermingled with the revenge themes popularized by Kyd.¹

BRITISH DRAMA

The work of the other writers of this time may for the most part be neglected. William Haughton, John Day, Henry Porter, Robert Wilson, and Samuel Rowley all left capably written dramas behind them ; but none set his seal upon the dramatic activity of the age. English-Men for my Money: or, A pleasant Comedy, called, A Woman will have her Will (1598 ; printed 1616), by the first named, is a bright comedy of realistic tendencies, and the same author's Grim the Collier of Croyden ; Or, The Devil and his Dame (1600 ; printed 1662 as by "I. T.") is a variant of the usual mixtures of realism, history, romance, and magic. Even more intrinsically interesting than these is Day's Humour out of Breath (1608) : here the character of Florimel gives life to a plot of the romantic type and recalls once more the witty maidens of Shakespeare's fancy. Day's work extends well into the seventeenth century ; but Henry Porter's only extant play, The Pleasant Historie of the two angrie women of Abington (c. 1597 ; printed 1599), is of the period we are discussing. This comedy has decided value because of the intense realism of the subject, and shows Porter in one way a predecessor of Jonson in the realm of satiric comedy. Robert Wilson belongs to an older and a different tradition. His right excellent and famous Comædy called the three Ladies of London (c. 1581 ; printed 1584) and The Pleasant and Stately Morall, of the three Lordes and three Ladies of London (c. 1589; printed 1590) are quite clearly based on the older morality tradition, and the realistic humour in them is but a further elaboration of similar realistic scenes in the early sixteenth-century plays we have already glanced at. Samuel Rowley is a more shadowy figure still. His one independent play is When you see me, You know me. Or the famous Chronicle Historie of King Henry the eight (c. 1603; printed 1605), but we are aware of his additions to Dr Faustus, and his authorship of several later plays is known from records of Sir Henry Herbert. The strength and virility of his acknowledged work is remarkable; and from this Mr H. Dugdale Sykes has argued that Rowley is the main author of The Famous Victories, of the prose scenes in The Taming of A Shrew, of certain passages in Orlando Furioso and others in Wily Beguiled. The correspondence between mannerisms to be found in these plays renders the attribution to Rowley highly probable.¹

¹ This play is interesting also because of the fact that many scenes are written in quite passable German.

THE UNIVERSITY WITS

Many lesser plays have here been deliberately omitted. An outline history such as this is cannot hope to do more than mention broad tendencies with a few selected concrete examples; and enough has been said perhaps to show the chief lines upon which drama was developing in the last years of the sixteenth century. The audience was manly, heroic, and broadminded; and accordingly we find the development of hardier features than are to be discovered in the later drama. At the same time, crudity in the presentment of tragic themes and vulgarity in many of the comic episodes existed by the side of high thinking and of beautiful romantic poetry. A thoroughly popular theatre will always produce these mingled elements of rich artistry and of roughness; there will always be in such a theatre a certain lack of refinement. On the other hand, there will usually be strength and hope and courage; there will be the freshness arising from breadth of outlook and of appeal. It must be our object in the following chapter to trace the rise of this early drama to a culmination in the hands of Shakespeare, and then to watch the gradual decline of the manlier elements as Court corruption laid its palsied hand upon the keen virility of the sixteenth-century theatre. In doing this, it will be necessary, first of all, to glance at the historical conditions governing the playhouses, and then to follow the fortunes of several of the most notable dramatic types. The analysis of seventeenth-century theatrical endeavour under the works of particular writers can end only in a certain confusion, for convention ruled, and the independence of the earlier drama soon gave way to a set of more or less stereotyped fashions in the theatres.

¹ For a criticism of Mr Sykes' theory see W. W. Greg's Two Elizabethan Stage Abridgements (1922), pp. 358-60.

BRITISH DRAMA

PART II

THE ELIZABETHAN, JACOBEOAN, AND CAROLINE DRAMA

CHAPTER I

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE PERIOD THE AUDIENCES AND THE THEATRES

HISTORICAL SURVEY

THE seventeenth century, with the earlier portion of which this chapter will deal, is possibly the most marvellous epoch England has ever witnessed. There is Anglo-Saxon literature from the seventh to the tenth centuries. There are Chaucer and Langland and the unidentified author of Gawayn and the Green Knight in the fourteenth. There are Spenser and the University Wits in the sixteenth. All of these are of great intrinsic importance ; but no one single century has seen such a florescence of artistic genius as appears in the works of Shakespeare, Chapman, Dekker, Jonson, Massinger, Middleton, Webster, Ford, and Shirley, to mention only a few of those who made the theatre glorious from 1600 to 1642. Hardly any century, moreover, displays such a variety of diverse moods and tendencies. This period which stretches from the last days of Elizabeth to the time of William and Mary shows not only the best work of Shakespeare and his companions, but also the tremendous glory of the Miltonic blank verse and the gradual chastening of poetry and of prose which reached a culmination in the works of Dryden. It starts in the full flush of romantic enthusiasm and closes with the establishment of correct and careful neo-classicism. At one end it knew Shakespeare ; at the other it knew Swift.

Between Shakespeare and Swift is a deep chasm, at first sight apparently without a solitary point of connexion between the one bank and the other. On closer view, however, it is seen that this chasm is bridged by innumerable links in a continued chain of development. There is, certainly, a chronological break toward the middle of the century in the Puritan domination, which extended from 1642 to 1660. Nevertheless, even this chronological break, serious as it appears, will be found to have exercised comparatively slight influence on the development of literature. There are Puritan elements to be discovered in the early Caroline drama, just as there are Cavalier elements to be traced in the Puritanism of Milton. Too strict an attention to chronology, indeed, may well lead toward a false conception of seventeenth-century literature, particularly of literature expressed through the medium of drama. A true realization of the development of artistic purposes in this epoch can be obtained only when the more precise data supplied by an historical study of the period are put aside, and tendencies, movements, modes of thought, are put in their stead. Perhaps no better method of delineating these tendencies and movements could be found than that which may be called the division by temperament. If we take the Elizabethan spirit, as exemplified in the works and lives of Spenser, Sidney, Raleigh, Drake, and Shakespeare, as an entity by itself, we find that the Cavalier spirit expressed by Fletcher and Ford and Shirley is no less independent, and that the differences between the two serve to provide a point of view from which we may regard the literary activity of each. The Puritan temperament follows, shown clearly in Milton's later works and in Marvell's; and that is succeeded by the temperament of the Restoration, seen markedly enough in Rochester's lyrics and Etherege's comedies, and itself leading by infinite gradations toward the Augustan or neo-classic mood of slightly later years. Not one of these temperamental elements is confined to a certain set of years, but if we take these as guides we shall find that by their aid we shall be able to classify almost all, if not quite all, the writers and thinkers of the time.

BRITISH DRAMA

The seventeenth century opened with the last years of

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE PERIOD

Elizabeth's reign. She had unified England. She had made her country one of the chief of European nations, the colossal defeat of the Armada having for that time dissipated fear of any foreign invasion of our shores. She had made herself, moreover, the head of a national Church. Her rule, if strict against Catholics and Puritans who were in any way adverse to her system of government, was, it may be said, accepted by all. She was vain; she was artificial; but she was a diplomat, and she was the symbol of England. The poets who sang to her those praises which she so loved to hear were in reality singing the praises of Albion.

Elizabeth died in 1603, and James VI of Scotland hurried down to accept her throne, altering his title to James I. He was thoroughly unlike the preceding monarch, and in his reign there developed certain tendencies, partly due to his own management of State affairs, which were destined to be of extreme consequence before many decades had passed. The first and most important concerned the question of divine right. Elizabeth had been supreme, but she had always known when to give way. James assumed her place with far more exalted ideas of kingly power, bringing from Scotland all that fantastic philosophy which concerned the rights of kingship and which was destined to bring more than one monarch of the house of Stuart to an untimely end. James, however, was almost the last person in the world fitted to keep up this rôle of flawless divinity. He had been gifted by nature with a clever but muddling brain. He was by way of being a pedant, acute and yet intensely foolish. Without real ability in kingship, without courage, without imperial grace, he tried to work with his wits to consolidate and establish that position for which he yearned. With him, then, in England grew up this new doctrine that kings could do no ill; with him too grew up that courtly body of men, less independent than the Drakes and Raleighs of a former period, who were to become the Cavaliers of the age of Charles I. With James's abrupt cessation from all foreign wars the broad free air that had informed the life and literature of Elizabeth's reign began to vanish. Literature and life grew artificial, courtly, more luxuriant, more immoral, more insidious, and yet, in their own way, more gorgeous. The bare simplicity and noble tone of the Shakespearian tragedy degenerated into the florid beauties of Webster and Ford ; the charm of As You Like It sank into the heated atmosphere of A King and No King.

In all history reactions are inevitably to be traced when any marked philosophy of life or tendency of government makes its appearance, and the reaction to this new spirit is to be seen in the rise of democratic Puritan sentiment. The Commons had been restive in Elizabeth's time, and this restiveness had nearly broken out into active rebellion in the year 1601. Only Elizabeth's diplomacy had, on that occasion, saved the country from disruption. In James's reign the dissatisfaction on the part of the Puritans became much more intense. They regarded his theory of the divine right of kings as a direct attack upon their political liberty. They looked with undisguised abhorrence upon his High Church ideas, seeing in them tendencies inimical to the reformed religion. They despised his Court as a place of infamy, alien to all good morals. The absence of foreign wars fostered internal dissension ; more and more men turned to the question of domestic politics, so that, as we watch the progress of history immediately after the old Queen's death, we can see the rift gradually widening—the Puritans becoming increasingly severe, the Court rioting it in gayer splendour, in more wanton festivities, in more ornate religion.

James was just sufficiently clever and died just sufficiently soon to avoid any serious trouble with his subjects ; but he left a serious legacy to his son, Charles. The latter, wholly unlike his father, was a gentleman, handsome, debonair, and artistically inclined. More and more he strengthened the Cavalier tradition, gathering round himself men of similar temperaments and kindred aspirations. In spite of his divine-right theories, his religion, and his artistic leanings he might well have made an ideal king for the moment. It is highly possible that, but for one failing, his manners and his appearance would have won the hearts of all but the most soured Puritans. That one failing proved his utter undoing. He was completely unscrupulous in regard to political matters, and when we add this to the facts that his queen was a Catholic and that he himself was lenient to Catholics we realize that the struggle which had been slowly becoming more and more bitter in the time of James was bound to break out in deadly earnest. All through his reign he struggled, committing mad and perfidious act after mad and perfidious act. In Wentworth and in Laud he surrounded himself with evil counsellors, alienating thus even those men who would otherwise have served him to the death. He struggled in Ireland, with apparent success at first, but eventually with complete and abject failure. He struggled in Scotland, raising there a hornet's nest which was doomed to bring about his ruin. By 1642 the tide was full; the Civil War broke out, bringing victory to the Puritans; in 1649 Charles himself went to the scaffold. The Puritan régime meant a rule of iron in England. The playhouses were officially closed. All sort of merriment ceased. The wan, steel-set faces of the Commonwealthmen turned from all gaiety, innocent and sinful, as a snare of the Evil One. The spirit of 'Merrie England,' however, could never be stifled in this wise, and murmurs of discontent are to be heard even before the death of Oliver Cromwell, so that it was but natural that the reaction to the reaction should appear in the short-lived rule of his son, Richard.

Charles II was recalled. For all those years he had been living, an exile, with his devoted band of Cavaliers. From one country to another he had passed in idleness, wasting his energies in drunkenness and wanton festivity. With his return the reaction to Puritan severity met with the abandon of these travelled Cavaliers, and all licence was permitted. The playhouses were thrown open; immorality was opposed to the morality of the preceding years; gaiety took the place of sadness and solemnity; careless abandon was substituted for restraint. The Restoration temperament, if so it may be called, endured for many years. With the Revolution of 1688 and the gradual consolidation of anti-Catholic power there came toward the end of the seventeenth century a certain change, manifested in life by a conventional morality and a soberness of demeanour, in literature by the forging of neo-classic precept and example.

So the tale goes on, movement succeeding movement, and reaction succeeding reaction. This rapid survey of the historical background against which the literature is revealed may help to throw into relief not only the main elements going to make up the separate moods of the time, but also the continuity of tradition, a continuity of tradition which, in spite of all classifications, must be observed in the drama of the period. One example here may be sufficient. Beaumont the Elizabethan joins with Fletcher the Cavalier, and between them they invent a new romantic drama, itself based on Shakespeare's earlier romantic comedies. Shakespeare is influenced and writes Cymbeline, The Tempest, and The Winter's Tale. Shirley a decade or so later feels the impress of the fresh style, and along with Shirley stands D'Avenant. D'Avenant becomes one of the chief figures in the development of early Restoration drama and hands on the tradition to Dryden and to the Earl of Orrery, with whom the romantic drama takes form as the heroic tragedy. This heroic tragedy mingles with the later blank-verse tragedy of 1679-1700 and is carried on into the eighteenth century. Thus are the movements of the time to be traced.

(ii) THE THEATRE

Before coming to an actual examination of the plays of the period covered by the years 1600 to 1642 it is necessary, in addition to the brief summary of the historical background, to make an analysis of the main tendencies in the theatre and the audience. It is impossible, of course, to assume the existence of one set form of theatre or of one established type of audience during these forty years; on the contrary, it is necessary here to trace the changes which became gradually operative within the reigns of James and of Charles. The theatre of Elizabeth's days was, as has been shown, a theatre of the people. Men and women of all classes flocked to it, and as a consequence the dramatists had to please both the nobility and the humbler citizens. There was a resultant catholicity of appeal in the plays of that time, added to a genuine healthiness of tone, a broader vision, and a rich, bombastic, poetic utterance. At the same time, coarseness and occasional vulgarity are to be found in the dramas of the age, as well as a lack of unity in conception. The sixteenth century could give birth to the idyllic charm of As You Like It and to the crudest farce, to the rich bombast of Tamburlaine and to Titus Andronicus, to the cheap vaudeville puns of Romeo and Juliet and to the lyrical passion which informs almost the whole of that tragedy.

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE PERIOD

In the early seventeenth century a well-marked change, or series of changes, becomes evident in the theatre. Fundamentally the actual playhouses remained as before with the platform stage and the many medieval conventions which the Burbages and the Alleyns had inherited from the mysteries and the moralities. Most of the principal theatres were built on the plan of the Globe, open to the sky and plainly square or circular, but alongside of these 'public' theatres there were springing up more and more of the 'private' type, generally rectangular, with roofs and artificial lighting. These 'private' theatres, which before had been in the hands of boy-companies, came to be used by the regular players and led the way toward the introduction of the more modern type of stage made popular in the reign of Charles II. It is obvious that in these closed-in playhouses, even in spite of the platform stage, scenery and primitive lighting effects could be introduced, and we may presume that the great developments made by Inigo Jones in the settings of the Court masques were bound to find reflection in the 'public' theatres. It is certainly symbolic that the first clear references to the use of scenery in the theatres appear during the last years of Charles' reign and that these are confined to the 'private' type of playhouse. Thus in 1637 Sir John Suckling provides suits and scenes to the value of £300 for a production of his Aglaura at Blackfriars; the same year Nabbes' Microcosmus was performed at Salisbury Court with scenery specially supplied; and three years later, in 1640, the then Lord Chamberlain defrayed the cost of the costumes and scenes for Habington's The Queene of Arragon, presented at Blackfriars. This tendency toward the greater use of the 'private' theatre and the corresponding tendency toward the utilization of scenery must be taken into account when we study the dramatic activity of the period.

Perhaps, too, we can trace an even greater employment of stage spectacle than was apparent in sixteenth-century dramas. Dumb shows, processions, and suchlike had been well favoured in the days of the University Wits, but they become even commoner in the seventeenth century. In Massinger and Dekker's The Virgin Martyr Sempronius enters "at the head of the Guard, soldiers leading three Kings bound."¹ A stage direction in Act II, Scene 1, of Massinger's The Fatal Dowry reads "Solemn Music. Enter the Funeral Procession," and in Act II, Scene 3, of the same play we find "Hautboys. Here a passage over the stage, while the Act is playing for the marriage of Charalois with Beaumelle." Middleton's The Mayor of Quinborough has many dumb shows, as has even such a comedy as Heywood's The Fair Maid of the West. So frequent did these become that the prologue to the latter's The English Traveller declares that play to be strange because there was

*No Drum, nor Trumpet, nor Dumbe show ;
No Combate, Marriage, not so much to day
As Song, Dance, Masque, to bumbaste out a Play.*

These dumb shows, of course, as in The Fair Maid of the West, were utilized to explain dramatic events too lengthy or too tedious to put on the stage. For this purpose, too, the old Chorus, which Shakespeare had employed, was made use of, as in The Mayor of Quinborough or as in The Fair Maid of the West, where Heywood apologizes :

¹ Act I, Scene 1.

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE PERIOD

Our Stage so lamely can expresse a Sea,
That we are first by Chorus to discourse
What should have beene in action.

The old tricks of the stage remained almost unchanged. Plays within plays were of frequent occurrence, sometimes, as in Middleton and Rowley's The Spanish Gipsy, not with great dramatic propriety, sometimes, as in Massinger's The Roman Actor, with exquisite effect. The example of Hamlet had itself been borrowed from an older tradition and aided in popularizing the convention. So, too, the old device of a girl dressed as a boy still held the boards. Still the actors all were men or boys,¹ and this device may have made easier the task of the youths who took women's parts. Shakespeare had abandoned the frequent use of this stage trick by 1600,² but others took it from him and carried forward its popularity. In three ways certain modifications of this particular device show the tendencies of the time. It aided in the first place toward the introduction of scenes of an indelicate character, foreign to the charm of As You Like It. Secondly, it helped toward pathetic situation, as in Beaumont and Fletcher's The Maid's Tragedy, where Aspatia dresses as a boy and allows herself to be killed by the lover who had rejected her. Thirdly, it assisted the dramatists in their constant search after novelty and complication of plot. Middleton's The Widow is a good example of this. Here Martia appears in boy's clothes. As a boy she excites the passions of Philippa, who, in order to hide this youth from her husband, re-dresses Martia as a girl. Still further to cheat her husband she permits Martia to go through a ceremony of marriage with Francisco. In the end the girl's identity is revealed. In a similar manner, the 2nd Luce in Heywood's The Wise Woman of Hogsdon is paired off with Young Chartley. Immorality or indelicacy, pathos, and the straining after novelty will be found to be three of the chief characteristics of Jacobean and Caroline literature.

¹ French actresses made an appearance in London about 1625, but were hissed out of the town.

² It appears, of course, in Cymbeline.

BRITISH DRAMA

The theatre, however, does not display to us so clearly the changes that were coming over the age as does the audience. Gradually, year by year, the playhouses became the haunts of the courtiers. With the rift that was ever widening between the followers of the King and the Puritans, the former indulged in still greater amusement, the latter refrained from those things patronized by the Cavaliers. Steadily the citizens left off attending the theatre, so that the audiences were made up mainly of the courtiers and Cavaliers, along with a sprinkling of the riff-raff of men and women who won their livelihood by pleasure and gambling. No longer did the theatre express the feelings of the people of England; it was rapidly becoming the exclusive property of an aristocratic clique. The dramatists found as year succeeded year that they had to write for a new taste; more and more they looked to the Court.

(iii) THE REFLECTION OF CONTEMPORARY CONDITIONS IN THE DRAMA

This new taste and its consequent effects upon the dramatic literature of the time had various results, and it may be well here to summarize briefly such as seem to be most exemplified in the typical dramas of the early seventeenth century.

We note, first of all, a certain new criticism, a more refined judgment of dramatic methods, leading ultimately toward a better technique. After 1600 the old chronicle history disappears. A few writers, such as Shakespeare, who had been brought up on the older traditions, might still retain some of its forms, but fundamentally it was replaced by something new. It cannot be regarded as a mere coincidence that Ben Jonson with his neo-classicism made his appearance just on the brink of the new century. His style, independent and individual as it seems, was in accord with the spirit of the age. In comedy Spanish intrigue, with the complicated plots always associated with that dramatic genre, led to a more elaborate and skilful structure. In tragedy very little that was so amorphous as The Spanish Tragedy or as Tamburlaine was written by the dramatists. Even Shakespeare, who in Antony and Cleopatra and in King Lear showed his indebtedness to former styles, displayed in Othello a very model of fine technique. Some of Beaumont and Fletcher's plays may appear to be carelessly constructed, but in the main their tragedies and comedies, however lacking they may be in deeper thought and higher purpose, are seen to be built on well-established lines. Massinger has a skill in construction that is well-nigh marvellous. Obviously the most difficult part of a play is the exposition, and it is in the more skilful expositions of seventeenth-century dramas that we note most clearly the growing power of the playwrights. Middleton and Rowley's The Spanish Gipsy is as typical as any, with its nervous opening dialogue bringing the audience at once into the very midst of the plot. Or else one might take Middleton's Women Beware Women, and observe the subtly conceived conversation carried on by Leantio, Bianca, and the Mother, conversation carefully designed to introduce the spectator to the action of the piece. Very rarely do we discover the hopelessly artificial first scenes of many of the earlier tragedies and comedies.

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE PERIOD

Against this more correct taste must be placed a tendency in the audience which led toward a weak dramatic close. These new courtiers who made up the bulk of the audience were more enervated than their predecessors had been, and accordingly, in tragedy especially, they had to be kept stimulated by a continual series of thrilling events. It is perfectly true that horror elements make their due appearance among the plays of the University Wits. The danger of generalization is shown by the fact that Professor Schücking accepts these horror elements as distinctively a characteristic of the earlier drama,¹ but there is, it seems, a difference between such elements as introduced in the sixteenth-century tragedies and similar elements in seventeenth-century plays. The earlier Elizabethans could heap horror upon horror in the best approved manner, so that a tragedy like Titus Andronicus became one long tale of terror and torment ; but in the seventeenth century we note an increased love of thrills, not necessarily throughout the whole play, but in stress-positions within the play. Thus many of the dramatists seemed to find a difficulty over their last acts. Commonly in their dramas a great crisis comes at the end of Act IV, only to be paralleled by another at the close of the drama. In Fletcher's Valentinian Æcius and Pontius commit suicide at the end of Act IV, Valentinian is poisoned in Act V, Scene 2, and Maximius dies at the conclusion of the play. Massinger's The Roman Actor has the thrilling death of Paris at the close of Act IV and the death of Cæsar at the close of Act V. The Virgin Martyr of Massinger and Dekker shows us the murder of Calista and Christeta in the midst of Act III, the martyrdom of Dorothea and the death of Antoninus at the end of Act IV, the torture and death of Theophilus at the close of Act V. All through these plays the dramatists attempt to fire the audience with suspense ; they construct their tragedies on the plan of a series of exciting episodes, and constantly employ theatrical devices, both good and bad, for the purpose of arousing attention. The horrors, the poisoned pictures, the drinking-cups made out of skulls, those devices made so familiar by Webster and Ford and Tourneur, are all manifestations of this aim. Fletcher's Valentinian and Heywood's The Rape of Lucrece are founded on abductions. Torture is presented on the stage in the first of these, as it is also in The Virgin Martyr, where Dorothea is beheaded coram populo. In Middleton's The Witch a wife is made by her husband to drink his health out of her father's skull.

¹ Character Problems in Shakespeare's Plays (1923).

BRITISH DRAMA

Not always, however, did the spectators desire to go away with final horrors in their minds, and hence we find, alongside of this tragedy of torment, the arising of a peculiar form of tragi-comedy typical of this age. In this form of tragi-comedy torment and horror hover in the air, but are finally dispelled by an artificial close. The Witch, mentioned immediately above, is a marked instance of this. The ghastly fancies of the husband lead the wife to attempts at murder. She thinks she has succeeded, but, finding that he is not dead, returns to his grace again. In the same author's The Widow Francisco, going to commit adultery, is suddenly and artificially struck with repentance and retires. So in The Spanish Gipsy, by Middleton and Rowley, Roderigo, who has violated Clara, has a sudden attack of conscience and marries her. This weak tragic-comedy obviously generates false psychology and artificial construction. Its many evil influences must be carefully borne in mind while we note the improved technique of the seventeenth-century dramatists.

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE PERIOD

The debility which was thus creeping upon the age, exemplified by both the last-mentioned tendencies, is further apparent in the interest which dramatists and spectators took in themes of incest. Ford is probably the best-known playwright in this connexion, but he by no means stood alone. Middleton in Women Beware Women has written a particularly objectionable drama on these lines, while many plays, such as Beaumont and Fletcher's A King and No King, treat the subject romantically. In the last-mentioned drama the audience is kept in suspense because of the love of the King, Arbaces, for his sister, Panthea. Tragedy is averted only when it is discovered that Arbaces is in reality not the true king and Panthea not his sister but the rightful queen. Love, particularly passionate and illicit love, has come to dominate the minds of the playwrights and of the audience; novelty is aimed at; and all means are taken to provide each drama with thrilling episodes, however artificial and unnatural they may be.

By the side of this degeneration of moral tone there is apparent in the audience of the seventeenth century an increasing love of pathos and of what may be called sentimentalism. Only a few writers of the period, such as Heywood in The English Traveller, can present beautiful pictures of upright honesty; the rest sink to carnal images and suggestive sensuality. A lowered moral tone, however, does not by any means signify an absence of sentimentalism. The richer sentimentalism of the eighteenth century grew into being in the midst of a hard-drinking, sensual age, just as this of the seventeenth century rose alongside the illicit loves of the Fordian drama and the coarse imaginings of Killigrew. Middleton's The Roaring Girl is thus full of sentiment. Moll is made impossible, because the authors were striving to present a wholly idealized view of her character. The duel in Middleton and Rowley's A Fair Quarrel is exactly in the style of Steele a century later. The noble-minded bandits in Massinger's The Guardian remind us of the similarly magnanimous vagabonds of late eighteenth-century dramas of sensibility. This sentimentalism, be it noted, frequently takes two forms. In one way it may be regarded as the genuine attempt of the humaner dramatists to stem the current of immorality, callousness, and corruption; in another as the merest pandering to an audience intent upon novelty, and eager to accept anything which might serve to whet their jaded appetites. Along with sentimentalism always goes pathos, that strange emotion ever to be appreciated yet exceedingly difficult to define accurately. Pathos, it may be said, is the weaker form of the tragic. The latter is heroic, leaving in the heart something inexplicable that is above tears. Pathos is always tear-compelling, and arouses a mood weaker and less noble than that majesty and awe associated with the highest tragedy. It must, of course, be realized not only that there are two forms of pathos, but that pathos may play an important and vital part in the greatest forms of tragedy. The scene when Lear wakens to discover Cordelia bending over him is indescribably pathetic, yet the whole of King Lear breathes the spirit not of pathos, but of terrible majesty. The pathos in only too many Jacobean and Caroline dramas is spread over all the scenes and all the characters. The true form of pathos may, at times, come near to the highest tragic expression, as in Massinger and Field's The Fatal Dowry or in Heywood's A Woman Killed with Kindness, but that form of the mood usually to be discovered in this period is the false and the artificial. The dramatists employ every means, illegitimate as well as legitimate, to stir the emotions of the spectators and to present before them something of novelty. So we find the wholly false pity summoned forth by Ford and the painful attempts at pathetic situation made by Shirley and even by Webster. The old heroic atmosphere visible in Othello is hard to discover in the tragedies produced between 1610 and 1642.

BRITISH DRAMA

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE PERIOD

With this debility goes a certain weakness in the power of characterization—another feature due to the desires of the spectators. More and more situation was being relied on rather than character, and the emphasis upon situation, added to the artificial changes of mood made necessary by the treatment of the dramas of the time, removed altogether the possibility of securing such finely developed individual figures as appear in earlier plays. In comedy Ben Jonson popularized the 'humours,' stock figures of no definite personality. In tragedy we meet with hardly anything save the regular, conventionalized stock types. The headstrong monarch is a favourite character of this sort, exemplified by Arbaces in Beaumont and Fletcher's A King and No King and by Dioclesian in Massinger and Dekker's The Virgin Martyr. The lustful tyrant is another; he appears in Fletcher's Valentinian and The Maid's Tragedy, and in Massinger's The Roman Actor. In these tragedies, too, there is always a predetermined hero, often a husband, and with him the inevitable heroine, either sinning or sinned against. As a foil and confidant to the former we are usually presented with a faithful friend, who is most commonly outspoken, blunt, and sincere. Mardonius in A King and No King, Romont in The Fatal Dowry, Aretus in Valentinian, and Melantius in The Maid's Tragedy are all characters drawn after this set plan. Add to this the sudden and wholly unpsychological revulsions of character which mar the majority of these dramas and we realize that there could be no possible delving into the depths of personality such as we find in Shakespeare.

So, too, with the themes of the plays themselves. Artificiality and novelty came rapidly to count for more than anything else. Comedy for a time was saved because of the realistic settings, but even those were being conventionalized through the influence of Spanish intrigue. As for tragedy, we find that ever more and more romantic plots came to be employed. There was a regular run on Roman plays, usually set in the time of the Empire ; and an equally popular run on tragedies the scenes of which were set in the Courts of Renaissance Italy. More important are the plays where for locality is selected some wholly impossible Sicily or Moldavia or kingdom of the East. The audience loved those scenes, because they spoke of an idealized realm not far apart from Arcadia ; strength being lost, they could not bear to witness the tragedy of daily life.

BRITISH DRAMA

These spectators, bound up in their own affairs, naturally desired, to a far greater extent than the Elizabethans, the introduction of politics into the theatre. Many of the plays of the time contain references to current events and to contemporary conditions. Most of the dramatists were servile divino jure royalists, and they delighted to flood their dramas with the most loyal of sentiments. A few, such as Chapman and Massinger, preserve an independence of judgment, but the majority follow the lines set down by Beaumont and Fletcher. In The Maid's Tragedy, for example, Amintor, hopelessly betrayed and wronged by his king, feels that there is no possibility for him of revenge. The populace were ridiculed on all sides, so that the stage increasingly divorced itself from the only audience that can make for a great national theatre—the people. Even a man like Massinger, vigorous as was his criticism of contemporary affairs, succumbed to the usual theories. He presents Dioclesian in The Virgin Martyr as acting wrongly, just as he presents Roberto in The Maid of Honour, but only on the advice of his evil counsellors. Probably, with sharper vision than the others, he saw the way affairs were tending, and desired to warn Charles against the Wentworths and the Lauds. Still, for him a king was enhaloed with a divine glory, and the ideas of the commonalty were anathema.

This political element which is to be traced most clearly in tragedy is paralleled by the rapid growth of satire in comedy. In the years before 1600 comedy had been boisterous, as in The Taming of the Shrew, or idyllic, as in As You Like It. After 1600 several circumstances tended to lead it in other directions. Poetical satire in the hands of Marston, Donne, and Guilpin taught men a medium which had been lost since Roman days; and the age was ripe for satire. A courtly age, an age when creative power is decaying, when civil abuses are rife, and when the audience or the reading public is confined to a small clique, will always produce satire. In 1598 appeared the first extant work of Ben Jonson, and Jonson's comedy is essentially satiric. Henceforth, comedy was to take two main lines of development—the one satiric, and the other purely romantic. The latter borrowed from tragedy a great deal of its spirit, and merged imperceptibly into the prevalent tragi-comedy. The former remained prevailingly realistic. Jonson's 'humours' are abstracts of the age, figures symbolizing this or that type of man, or this or that corruption of the time. Comedy thus poured scorn on the Puritans. It attacked the 'roarers,' as in Middleton and Rowley's A Fair Quarrel. It hit out at the nouveaux riches, as in Massinger's A City Madam. It ridiculed the conceited fops, as in The Maid of Honour; the milites gloriosi, as in Every Man in his Humour; the University-bred fools, as in Heywood's The Wise Woman of Hogsdon and Middleton's A Chaste Maid in Cheapside. Everywhere it spread its net to catch the follies and the vices of the time.

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE PERIOD

In this development of satire it was but to be expected that the dialogue of plays should become more natural and lifelike, and this tendency toward greater realism in language is a marked feature in almost all early seventeenth-century drama. In comedy the endeavour affected the scenes both for good and for evil. Obviously one of the readiest methods of securing the realistic effect was the introduction of slang terms and of barbarisms. Jonson used the 'philosophical' cant in his The Alchemist, the cant of the Puritans in Bartholomew Fair. Middleton and Rowley's A Fair Quarrel has pages of 'roaring words,' and Dekker's portion of The Roaring Girl abounds in 'Alsatian terms,' the dialect of thieves, already used, though sparingly, by Shakespeare.

BRITISH DRAMA

The result was a considerable brightening of comedy, for dialect of any sort is an unfailing tool in the hands of the lighter dramatists. On the other hand, the lengthy use of an unknown, or approximately unknown, dialect will inevitably become wearisome; and its effect, moreover, will disappear as the centuries pass by. There is something of this monotony in Jonson's plays, felt even in spite of the genius and vivacity of the author; and when we turn to other comedies by less talented writers we see that a vast number of them may be read now only by particular students of the period, and then not without the assistance of a body of explanatory notes. A complementary development is to be witnessed likewise in the verse of the more serious dramatists. Shakespeare's blank verse was always the blank verse of a poet. He was often obscure, always lyrical, always impassioned. In contrast to this type of dramatic dialogue, which Shakespeare shared with, or inherited from, the writers of the sixteenth century, we may place the blank verse of Fletcher and his companions. With the exception of a few writers, of whom Ford is the chief, we find that there are practically no dramatists of the later period who utilize this lyrical utterance. The Restoration critics were right when they declared that Beaumont and Fletcher wrote a courtly language—wrote, that is to say, as courtiers might speak. The verse of tragedy and of tragi-comedy lost its distinctively poetic rhythm. It abandoned, to employ Symonds' metaphor, the pitch of poetry. The consequence is that if we read the dialogue of any of these plays, we seem to be listening to the extremely elegant words of a fine speaker, not to the rhapsodies of a poet.

If we bear in mind these various aspects of early seventeenth-century drama we shall have gone far toward diagnosing the whole of the theatrical activity of the time. Individually diverse as the playwrights were, they formed, as Schlegel realized, a 'school,' so that the works of any one member of that school are much nearer to the works of any other member than to the works of a writer living before 1600 or after 1660.

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE PERIOD

(iv) THE MAIN TYPES OF DRAMA, 1600-42

Most of the chief tendencies of the dramatic literature of these forty years have been outlined above, but the scattered references may here be gathered together and summarized afresh. To this period belong the greatest works of Shakespeare's genius. His only true tragedy before 1600, if we except the history plays, was Romeo and Juliet, admittedly a youthful effort. Only after 1600 did he write Hamlet, Lear, Othello, and Macbeth, along with the series of Roman plays, Julius Cæsar, Antony and Cleopatra, and Coriolanus. The Shakespearian tragedy, therefore, must be accounted one of the principal forms within this period. It must, however, be recognized that Shakespeare was not followed directly by any other writer. Many caught echoes of his language; several copied his characters; a few boldly imitated scenes in his plays; but there was no one who captured the tremendous spirit of his efforts in tragedy. Shakespeare, after all, was an Elizabethan, and the age was passing beyond the mood of earlier times. The horror tragedy, particularly of the more decadent type, thrilled the audience, and tragi-comedy came with its world of impossible romance to charm weaker minds and weaker eyes. These are the typical genres of serious drama during this epoch. As if in opposition to them, on the other hand, are the many tentative experiments in domestic drama. Arden of Feversham led the way, and Heywood gave the seal of artistic perfection to the type in The English Traveller and A Woman Killed with Kindness. The domestic drama, however, was never very popular, and died away until it was revived again in the eighteenth century.

In comedy similar movements are traceable. The tragi-comedy of a romantic cast had its unquestionable influence on the minds of the comic dramatists, and Spanish intrigue came to usurp more and more attention. The Spanish drama was magnificently fitted to appeal to the ages of James and of Charles. Under Lope de Vega and Calderon it had won a supreme place in the world of art.

BRITISH DRAMA

More and more the Court was looking to Spain, as the old feeling which had risen to white heat in the days of the Armada passed away. The Spanish comic theatre was distinguished by three characteristics: the romantic tone which frequently enveloped the more serious scenes; the insistence upon intrigue, or action, at the expense of the characters; and the air of aristocratic gallantry engendered in a strictly monarchist country amid conventions of a late stage of civilization. All three appealed to the English playwrights and spectators. Here they found the courtly air, the atmosphere of assignations and intrigues, the slight colouring of romantic sentiment, for which they pined. With Fletcher the Iberian comedy was popularized in England, and was destined to run its course well into the eighteenth century. The comedy of intrigue was sometimes realistic in character, more commonly of a fashionable artificiality. Realism was more definitely encouraged by Ben Jonson, who, with his comedy of humours, endeavoured to establish more correct standards in the London theatres. In many ways this realistic comedy may be related to the domestic tragedy of the Arden of Feversham type, for both aided in keeping some measure of common sense in the theatre. Romanticism and intrigue were rapidly leading toward exaggeration of effect and artificiality of psychological delineation; the realist movement did at least keep the eyes of the dramatists intent upon contemporary London and its characters.

Besides these main theatrical traditions, which constantly mingle one with another, there are, of course, to be traced many other peculiar forms of drama which may hardly be classified into distinct groups. The revenge play, as developed by Kyd in The Spanish Tragedy, had a successful career in the seventeenth century, but may be considered along with the horror tragedy. Several serious dramas by Massinger seem to stand in a class by themselves. Beaumont and Fletcher's The Knight of the Burning Pestle marks the development of a new form, the dramatic burlesque. A few attempts were made at classical tragedy. A minute examination of these independent plays will serve to show the immense variety in the theatrical activity of the period ; but for our purposes in this volume, in order to gain, as it were, a bird's-eye view of the chief developments in the drama from mystery play to modern tragedy and comedy, it is necessary to bear in mind the larger and more outstanding dramatic tendencies of the age.

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE PERIOD

CHAPTER II

ROMANTIC COMEDY AND ROMANTIC TRAGI-COMEDY

THE ROMANTIC COMEDY OF SHAKESPEARE

OUR analysis of the development of drama has already covered the work of the interlude writers and of the University Wits. Chronologically this survey has carried us to the end of the sixteenth century, but so far nothing has been said of Shakespeare's endeavour in the world of dramatic art. It is imperative now to return to the eighties and nineties, when Marlowe, Greene, and Kyd flourished, in order to view the dramatic work of Shakespeare in those years.

The career of Shakespeare is so well known, so much attention has been paid to his own life and to the circumstances in which his plays were written, that little space need be taken here with mere matters of fact. His dramatic work started, as all critics are agreed, with Love's Labour's Lost, and from the date when this was produced up to 1600 he had written over half of his extant works. Of these dramas several are histories, some of this type being purely tragically conducted, as Richard II and Richard III, some mainly comically, as Henry IV. There is, besides, the single lyrical tragedy of his early years, Romeo and Juliet, one or two farcical or realistic comedies, The Taming of the Shrew and The Merry Wives of Windsor, and, finally, the array of romantic comedies, including The Two Gentlemen of Verona, A Midsummer Night's Dream, As You Like It, Twelfth Night, Much Ado about Nothing, and The Merchant of Venice. It is with the last group that we are concerned here. In writing these he was obviously influenced deeply by Peele, Greene, and Lyly. The precociousness of Love's Labour's Lost shows clearly the influence of the last; Rosalind is a child of Greene's imagination as well as of Shakespeare's. The blank verse of all the dramas re-echoes melodies already devised by his University predecessors and contemporaries. There was no exaggeration in the accusation that the young Stratford actor was beautifying himself with their feathers.

ROMANTIC COMEDY & TRAGI-COMEDY

All these comedies are bound together by a common bond of romantic treatment. Characters and scenes alike are viewed through magic casements which transform reality. The settings are all imaginative—an unhistorical France, Ephesus, Thebes, Arden, Illyria, and Venice—each one conceived in the glow of a strange and beautiful fancy. Yet all are related to real life. There are contemporary figures and contemporary fashions in Love's Labour's Lost; Bottom and his companions mingle with the fairies; Sir Toby Belch and Sir Andrew Aguecheek are companions of Viola and Olivia, Dogberry and Verges of Hero and Beatrice. This is the cardinal characteristic of Shakespeare's romantic world—the union of realism and fantasy. Any other writer, placing Titania and Bottom in such close juxtaposition, might well have failed to secure unity of form, and our purpose in analysing these romantic comedies must be to discover that secret whereby Shakespeare was enabled to introduce such apparently conflicting characters. This secret is to be discovered, it would seem, in that particular form of humour which dominates these plays as well as the more riotously comic Henry IV. This humour, a union of intellect and emotion, irradiates both the character and the scene, making romantic the ordinary things of life and making realistic the most imaginative and improbable characters and events.¹ Through it the Forest of Arden becomes for us as actual as Epping Forest; through it Bottom is seen revealed in a halo of imagination which makes him a fit companion for the delicate fairy queen.

As we trace Shakespeare's dramatic development in these plays we can watch this humour deepening in character, just as we can watch the gradual evolution of his dramatic power. A Pleasant Conceited Comedie called, Loues labors lost (c. 1590-1; printed 1598) is a tyro's play. It is full of puns, of ridicule, of satire. The youthful country actor and poet, from the height of his inexperienced wisdom, looks down with amused contempt upon the exaggerated fashions of his time, upon the impossible academies which Italy was introducing all over Europe. Love's Labour's Lost is a clever play, but it is not great. Its structure is artificial and mechanical, much of its humour decidedly superficial.¹ The Two Gentlemen of Verona (c. 1591; printed 1623) already strikes a deeper note. In Julia and Silvia we first meet that pair of heroines immortalized later in Rosalind and Celia, Portia and Nerissa, Hero and Beatrice. So similar do these pairs of girl figures seem that we are tempted to believe that at this time Shakespeare had in his company a couple of boy actors, one taller than the other, one more serious and dignified, the other more impertinent and vivacious. In studying Shakespeare's dramas we must always bear in mind the fact that this poet, independent of time and place as he may seem, was an actor in a particular company, intent on writing successful dramas and inevitably creating his characters with at least a slight thought of the particular players who were to impersonate them. In this comedy, too, we meet that pair of clownish servants, likewise with kindred characteristics, called here Launce and Speed, renamed later as Old Gobbo and Young Gobbo or Dogberry and Verges. Surely here once more Shakespeare was thinking of two comedians in his own troupe. The Two Gentlemen of Verona shows great advance in characterization, but in structure it remains somewhat mechanical and artificial. Shakespeare so far has been able to secure in comedy neither depth nor organic unity. A Midsummer night's dream (1594-5; printed 1600) introduces us to the richer development of Shakespeare's art. There is magnificent poetry here, wherein the author has got beyond the mere description of the earlier dramas and reaches a stage where imagination transforms the whole of the natural world.

¹ On this quality of humour see Sully's Essay on Laughter or the present writer's An Introduction to Dramatic Theory.

BRITISH DRAMA

¹ Love's Labour's Lost has been usually assigned to the years 1590-1 and regarded as Shakespeare's first play. Recent criticism, on the other hand, has tended to establish the date of production as 1593 or 1594.

ROMANTIC COMEDY & TRAGI-COMEDY

And neuer since the middle Summers spring
Met we on hil, in dale, forrest, or mead,
By pauled fountaine, or by rushie brooke,
Or in the beached margent of the sea. . . .

Passages such as this leave the meticulous enumeration of nature's beauties far behind. The profundity of this play is seen further in the development of a certain mystical or symbolic note which is ever apparent in the works of Shakespeare's maturity and which reaches its culmination in the famous address of Prospero toward the close of his career.

These things seeme small & vndistinguishable,
Like farre off mountaines turned into Clouds, says Demetrius, and Hermia answers him :

Me-thinks I see these things with parted eye,
When euery things seemes double.

This note is intensified too in some of the last words of the play, where Theseus, commenting on Hippolyta's ridicule of the "Pyramus and Thisbe" playlet, utters what might be regarded as a veritable defence of all the romantic drama :

The best in this kind are but shadowes, and the worst are no worse, if imagination amend them.

Shakespeare's immense advance in stagecraft is fully to be witnessed in this play. The complicated plot with its subtle and careful unravelling displays that at last he has come to the maturity of his powers. Here he is no longer the tyro, but a master of his craft. This sense of power is to be traced in all the other romantic comedies. As You Like It (c. 1599-1600; printed 1623) shows it clearly. Taking his material from Lodge's Rosalynde, or Euphues Golden Legacy,¹ Shakespeare has here reached the summit of his purely romantic art. The story is well told, and the characters of Jaques, Rosalind, Celia, and Touchstone stand out, fully delineated, as even the persons of A Midsummer Night's Dream fail to do. The gentle melancholy of the piece, intensified by the only half-satiric presentation of the professional melancholic in Jaques, added to the pastoral charm of the Forest of Arden scenes, has made this, and rightly, one of the most prized of Shakespeare's comedies. Twelfth Night, Or what you will (c. 1600 ; printed 1623), for the plot of which Shakespeare has gone to a tale told in the Arcadia with suggestions apparently from an Italian piece called Gl' Ingannati (1537), carries on the same tradition with, perhaps, a trifle more of hilarity and boisterous humour. Touchstone is called to life again in Feste, Rosalind and Celia in Viola and Olivia. The symbolic songs, such as "Blow, blow, thou winter wind," which had added to the charm of As You Like It, have here been reproduced in "O Mistress mine" and "Come away, come away, Death." The most salient features of Twelfth Night, however, are the character of Malvolio and the Sir Toby Belch scenes. Malvolio is a more finely drawn study than any of Shakespeare's previous romantic characters. His self-satisfied assurance, his ambition, his Puritanic contempt of others, are all held up to ridicule, yet so subtly is the caricature put before us, with such infinite humour and delicacy, that we feel somehow a bond of sympathy for the ill-used majordomo. What Shakespeare's own purpose was here, it is hard to determine, but for modern readers Malvolio holds a place very similar to that occupied by Shylock. Sir Toby Belch has a general family likeness to Falstaff, and in the hilarious drinking scene we are irresistibly reminded of adventures in the Boar's Head Tavern. Both are presented in the same way, with this general halo of romantic humour which envelops the drunkards and the roysterers even as it envelops the pathetic fooling of Touchstone and the charm of Hermia.

¹ Published in 1590. It has been reprinted in the "Shakespeare Classics," a very useful series which provides material for the study of Shakespeare's sources.

BRITISH DRAMA

This quality of humour is seen nowhere more plainly than in the character of Falstaff. The History of Henrie the Fourth ; With the battell at Shrewsburie, betweene the King and Lord Henry Percy, surnamed Henrie Hotspur of the North. With the humorous conceits of Sir Iohn Falstalffe (c. 1597 ; printed 1598 and 1599) is by no means a romantic comedy, but it may be dealt with here because of this common method of treatment. The delineation of Falstaff reveals well the peculiar sympathy which is inherent in this mood of humour. Falstaff is a braggart, perhaps a coward, certainly a disreputable old sinner, yet there is hardly anyone who does not feel for him and sympathize with him. If we regard him in the cold light of reason we are bound to shun and to condemn him ; but no audience ever could regard Falstaff in the cold light of reason because of this intangible sympathy which Shakespeare has transfused into his pages. The humour of the man is so broad ; he, like the characters of the purely romantic comedies, can laugh not only at others, but at himself. His intellect is so acute, his sense of fun so highly developed, that we cannot but take him to our hearts. It is the fact that Shakespeare has presented Falstaff in The Merry Wives of Windsor without this humour which makes the majority of readers feel that the latter is an immeasurably weaker and less interesting play.

ROMANTIC COMEDY & TRAGI-COMEDY

The pure romantic comedies have been dealt with above, but there remain one or two other dramas related to them or belonging to the same class which must here be considered. Much adoe about Nothing (c. 1599 ; printed 1600), All's Well, that Ends Well (c. 1599 ; printed 1623) ; The most excellent Historie of the Merchant of Venice. With the extreame crueltie of Shylocke the Iewe towards the sayd Merchant, in cutting a iust pound of his flesh : and the obtayning of Portia by the choyse of three chests (c. 1595 ; printed 1600), and Measure, for Measure (c. 1604 ; printed 1623) are all bound together by the fact that each one presents elements of a more depressing or tragic kind than are to be discovered in the earlier plays. There are serious happenings in the air both in As You Like It and in A Midsummer Night's Dream, but never for one moment do we doubt that all will come right in the end. The Merchant of Venice might well have ended as a tragedy. These four plays may be considered as leading the way toward the fuller romantic tragi-comedy of later years, although they are all nearer in form to As You Like It than to The Winter's Tale. The Merchant of Venice, the story of which Shakespeare took from Il Pecorone (the 'bond' tale), Gesta Romanorum (the 'casket' tale), and Masuccio (the 'Jessica' tale), although it is one of the most popular of Shakespeare's plays, presents the greatest number of critical problems. The clever interweaving of story with story has made it a success upon the stage, but that cannot blind us to the facts that it exhibits a strange lack of unity of tone and that Shylock himself is a figure more calculated for tragedy than for comedy. It is possibly Shakespeare's consciousness of this latter weakness that made him give to some scenes of the drama a more than usually romantic colouring. The whole story is incredible and fanciful. The choosing of the caskets is utter nonsense, and no one ever believes in Portia's masquerade and specious arguments. We are content to suffer a little "willing suspension of disbelief" when we witness As You Like It, but The Merchant of Venice is frankly impossible. This romantic colouring is intensified by the references to music. So numerous are these that one might well imagine the whole drama to be accompanied by various melodies.

BRITISH DRAMA

Let musicke sound while he doth make his choise,
Then if he loose he makes a Swan-like end,
Fading in musique, says Portia in Act III, Scene 2.

I am neuer merry when I heare sweet musique, remarks Jessica (Act V, Scene 1) and Lorenzo replies :

The reason is, your spirits are attentiuē. . . .
The man that hath no musicke in himselfe,
Nor is not moued with concord of sweet sounds.
Is fit for treasons, stratagems, and spoyles,
The motions of his spirit are dull as night,
And his affections darke as Erebus :
Let no such man be trusted.

Consciously or unconsciously, Shakespeare has here taken away some of the reality of the play. This unreality was made necessary by the presence of Shylock. Perhaps for contemporaries Shylock was a mere villain, but no amount of modern criticism¹ will take away from modern readers and modern audiences the impression that Shylock is a truly tragic figure. He becomes more than an object of pity; he is a being of awe and majesty, rising far above the vacuous Antonio, the mean and adventurous Bassanio, the would-be clever lady, Portia. There may be justifications for the Christians' contempt of him, but his justification for hating them is still greater. The more we study The Merchant of Venice the more we see what a colossal dramatic failure it was. Here two moods, the mood of romantic fantasy and the mood of tragic reality, have met, and neither is satisfied. Shakespeare for once has overstepped the bounds of art.

¹ Such as, for example, Professor Schücking's Character Problems in Shakespeare's Plays.

ROMANTIC COMEDY & TRAGI-COMEDY

Much Ado about Nothing (c. 1599) presents something of the same phenomenon, although not in so marked a degree. The main story seems traceable back to Bandello, and to it Shakespeare has added the fascinating figures of Benedick and Beatrice. The tragic atmosphere here is not so pronounced as in the last play, largely because Don John, the villain, is little more than a mere puppet, and, while for a moment a tragic conclusion seems inevitable, the serious portion is conducted in a purely romantic manner, never coming out of the picture as it does in The Merchant of Venice. Here, too, the improbability of the story aids Shakespeare in his treatment of the material, and music is called in to enwrap the action in its soul-clinging folds. "Sigh no more, ladies," and that exquisite lyric "Pardon goddesse of the night," which Shelley seems to have had in mind when he wrote his hymn to the Spirit of Night, symbolically arouse emotions in our hearts fit for the receiving of the action and characters of the play. Along with the music may be noted, likewise, the use of symbolic language calculated to affect audience or reader. In The Merchant of Venice Portia's "It is almost morning" has the same purpose and effect as have Pedro's words in Much Ado.

Good morrow masters, put your Torches out,
The wolues haue preied, and looke, the gentle day
Before the wheeles of Phœbus, round about Dapples the drowsie East with spots of grey.

BRITISH DRAMA

These romantic comedies, from A Midsummer Night's Dream to Much Ado about Nothing, seem to take place in a realm of dreams and twilight, ere dawn comes to move us once more back to reality.

In All's Well that Ends Well (c. 1599) and in Measure for Measure (c. 1604) the world is darker still. The first of these plays seems taken directly from Paynter's Pallace of Pleasure, although the story originally appeared in Boccaccio's Decamerone. The story is nauseous and disgusting. The thought of a noble woman's so debasing herself as to capture a husband by the means presented here is so degrading that few can take any pleasure in the reading of the play. Coleridge has called Helena the finest of Shakespeare's heroines, but this nineteenth-century critic's attitude toward all of Shakespeare's women is so sentimental that it becomes almost negligible. Helena is one of the most characterless of Shakespeare's heroines. Bertram, whom she tricks into marriage at the end, is equally without personality. His sudden repentance at the close and his declaration that he will love Helena "ever, ever dearly" seem nothing but artificial nonsense. Measure for Measure is a finer play. As the story appeared in Cinthio's Hecatommithi the sister to save her brother goes to the deputy-governor; the latter treacherously orders the brother to be hanged; the faithful gaoler saves him, and the sister is married to her betrayer. In adapting this theme to the requirements of the stage, Shakespeare has caused Isabella to retain her chastity and has married her to the Duke at the conclusion of the comedy. Again, the plot is improbable and rather nauseous. In spite of Isabella's words to Angelo in Act II, Scene 2, there is little of a real problem put before us, and the presence of a problem could have been the sole excuse for a work on this theme. Isabella, Angelo, the Duke, and Claudio are all weakly drawn characters, touched all of them with Shakespeare's magic power, but never assuming truly individual proportions. The only portions of the play, indeed, where Shakespeare seems thoroughly to enjoy himself are those which normally are condemned to-day. There is an exquisite humour in the presentation of that lower-world existence where dwell Lucio and Elbow, Froth and Pompey, Mistress Overdone and Barnardine. Especially does he appear to love the last. Barnardine is a mental aristocrat, and his contumacious words to the Duke fully deserve his pardon in the final act of the drama.

ROMANTIC COMEDY & TRAGI-COMEDY

Turning back to review this Shakespearian romantic comedy, we find that the plays fall naturally into two groups: those in which the comic and humorous scenes preponderate, and those in which tragedy or scenes of darkness obscure for a time the presence of laughter. In the former, artistic effect has been secured by the subordinating of each play to an element of Puck-like humour, where the roguish spirit of mischief and sage wisdom meet. In the latter, verisimilitude has been strained, and the tragic or horrible scenes detract from our enjoyment of the rest. All the plays have a family likeness. Apart from the kindred characters already noted, and the common romantic tone, we observe the repetition of devices and of stage tricks in one drama after another. The "tedious brief scene of young Pyramus and his love Thisbe; very tragical mirth" was re-echoed many times in his work; it was a joke too good to be lost. Quince, who makes "fritters of English," finds his brother in Elbow of Measure for Measure and in Dogberry of Much Ado about Nothing. At the same time, the later group, presenting a common artistic failing, is distinct from the first; the plays of this type inevitably lead toward the romantic tragi-comedy of Beaumont and Fletcher.

(ii) THE ROMANTIC TRAGI-COMEDY OF BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER

This romantic tragi-comedy in its fullest form does not make its appearance until the production of A King and No King (1611; printed 1619), but after that date it flourished until the closing of the theatres in 1642, and itself gave rise to several marked developments both in tragedy and in comedy. A King and No King is as typical as any of the style of drama which came to be particularly associated with these two authors. The scene is an impossible Iberia, where Arbaces, a headstrong young monarch, falls in love with his supposed sister, Panthea. The theme is a dangerous one, and it is treated with a certain air of prurience. Every means is used to heighten the emotions of the work, and the conversation of the two lovers is such that we feel disappearing the older nobility of the Elizabethan age. The end of the fourth act finds us on the threshold of what appears must be a tragedy :

BRITISH DRAMA

Panthea. But is there nothing else,
That we may do, but only walk ? methinks
Brothers and Sisters lawfully may kiss.

Arbaces. And so they may Panthea, so will we,
And kiss again too ; we were too scrupulous,
And foolish, but we will be so no more.

Panthea. If you have any mercy, let me go
To prison, to my death, to any thing :
I feel a sin growing upon my blood,
Worse than all these, hotter than yours.

Arbaces. That is impossible, what shou'd we do ?

Panthea. Flie, Sir, for Heavens sake.

Arbaces. So we must away.

Sin grows upon us more by this delay.

And then suddenly in the last act it is discovered that Arbaces is not the true king, is not the brother of Panthea, the rightful queen, and so can marry her, regain his seemingly lost throne, and be happy ever after. The artificiality of the whole floods in upon us, and we see how far this type of drama, albeit well constructed and well written, has sunk from the deeper, richer, profounder, romantic comedy of Shakespeare. In scene it is more truly impossible ; in character it is stereotyped and artificial ; in language less close to the true workings of the human heart. It lacks individuality ; one romantic tragi-comedy will follow another, without the introduction of fresh characters and often even without the introduction of fresh themes. Bonduca (c. 1612 ; printed 1647) presents the same atmosphere with more tragic implications and with a shifting from the East to ancient British history and legend. Here some distinct merit can be discerned in the portrayal of Bonduca and of Caractacus. Still more typical is The Custome of the Country (c. 1619 ; printed 1647). This was written, according to recent theory, by Fletcher and Massinger, but it is probable that the former was mainly responsible for the construction of the play. The theme is thoroughly romantic. Arnoldo marries Zenocia, but Clodio claims the custom of the country, that a newly married girl be sent to his house. Arnoldo, his brother Rutilio, and Zenocia fly by boat. Outside Lisbon Zenocia is captured by pirates, but her two cavaliers escape. From this point the action of the comedy breaks into two. Arnoldo is loved by Hippolyta, is tempted, and is finally cast into the hands of law officers. In her rage Hippolyta poisons Zenocia ; but, repenting, releases Arnoldo, brings Zenocia back to life, and herself marries Leopold. The other theme concerns Rutilio, who in a street fight apparently kills Duarte, the son of Guiomar. The last-named character, through a promise, shields the supposed murderer. His adventures are various, and he is about to be executed as a murderer when Duarte, happily recovered, reveals himself. The whole play is one of surprises and intrigue intermingled with exceedingly coarse brothel scenes, which are reminiscent of the similar scenes in Pericles.

ROMANTIC COMEDY & TRAGI-COMEDY

The number of these dramas makes an individual account of each impossible. The Pilgrim (1621 ; printed 1647), The Prophetesse (1622 ; printed 1647), The Island Princess (1621 ; printed 1647), and The Sea Voyage (1622 ; printed 1647) are among the best of a series of flagrantly romantic works. The last, no doubt written almost entirely by Fletcher, but showing the presence of some Massinger characteristics in a few scenes, reminds us in the opening of The Tempest. The theme is somewhat complicated and deals almost entirely with love. Rosellia, her daughter Clarinda, and others have formed an island commonwealth of women since Rosellia's husband has been reported slain. This husband, Sebastian, in reality lives on a neighbouring island, from which in the end he escapes. Into this romantic atmosphere come Albert and Aminta in search of the latter's brother Raimond. They are captured by the Amazons, and there Clarinda falls in love with Albert. The men are about to be put to death when Sebastian makes a belated appearance. As is evident, every attempt here is made to intensify the unreality of the setting, and as much opportunity as possible is given for the elaboration of out-of-the-way amorous sentiments. In writing The Maid in the Mill (1623 ; printed 1647) Fletcher seems to have been aided by William Rowley. It is an ill-constructed play with some fine poetical passages and a certain amount of good comic business. The story deals with the enmity of the houses of Julio and Bellides. Antonio of the first falls in love with Ismenia, daughter of Bellides. Their love is nearly crossed by the treachery of Martino and Aminta, who in the end find themselves married to one another. A couple of subplots run alongside of this—one in which Otrante abducts Florimell, but is awed by her purity, and another in which Bustopha, the clownish son of Franio, contributes some rude merriment to the play. Of the same type is The Two Noble Kinsmen (c. 1614 ; printed 1634), attributed to Fletcher and Shakespeare. Shakespeare's hand in it, particularly in Act I and in the earlier gaoler scenes, seems to the present writer assuredly evident, but probably no certain judgment can ever be made upon it from the mere evidence of style. Here we find the proud and rather caddish Palamon and the somewhat more refined Arcite thrown into throes of love for Emilia. The play is full of romantic sentiment and ends in a typically tragi-comical way, one of the characters, according to legend, dying and the other accepting the bride. The Faire Maide of the Inne (1626 ; printed 1647) deals with a theme similar to that of The Maid in the Mill. Its association with Fletcher has been frequently questioned, but in essence it follows his style. Albertus, father of Cæsario, quarrels with Baptista, father of Mentivole. The last mentioned falls in love with Clarissa, Cæsario's sister, and after a number of complicated delays wins her in marriage at the close. Cæsario, for his part, loves Biancha, the fair maid of the inn, who turns out to be Baptista's daughter. The plot is fairly well worked out, but is full of impossible situations. A light-comedy theme is introduced in the person of Forobosco, who poses as a magician.

BRITISH DRAMA

ROMANTIC COMEDY & TRAGI-COMEDY

All the Beaumont and Fletcher plays ¹ of this type betray the same features. Everywhere is a straining for a more and more impossible romance. Artificiality of sentiment takes the place of truth to character; pruriency that of high moral tone; complication of plot that of due incident and probability of subject-matter. Most of the dramas fail because of the lack of relationship between cause and effect. The deus ex machina is everywhere present, and the plays as a consequence lose that unity of purpose, that inevitability, which characterize the works of Shakespeare.

(iii) THE INFLUENCE OF BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER ON SHAKESPEARE

Shakespeare himself, however, was unquestionably influenced by Beaumont and Fletcher, producing in The Tragedie of Cymbeline (c. 1609; printed 1623), The Winters Tale (c. 1610; printed 1623), The Tempest (1611; printed 1623), and Pericles, Prince of Tyre (c. 1608; printed 1609) works of a distinctly Beaumont and Fletcher cast. It must be remembered, of course, while we note this influence upon his work, that Shakespeare's own romantic style was moving steadily in this direction in the closing years of the sixteenth century. In Pericles Shakespeare no doubt collaborated with another, who has been identified variously as George Wilkins, the author of The Miserie of Inforst Mariage (1607), and William Rowley. Concerning the parts taken by these collaborators opinion has differed sadly, although it seems from the style and vitality of the dialogue that even the most suspected passages, the brothel scenes, must have owed something at least to the hand of the master. There is an intimate connexion between the similar passages in Measure for Measure and this play.

¹ It is observable that only a small percentage owe anything to Beaumont. Most were written by Fletcher and Massinger in collaboration.

BRITISH DRAMA

The shipwreck, the sudden discoveries, the descent to what seems the atmosphere of tragedy, and the sudden brightening of the close all mark out the relationship between this play and the romantic tragi-comedies of the time. Cymbeline, like Bonduca, takes us back to early Britain, and here once more the atmosphere is one of improbability. We note the decay of Shakespeare's style. His characters are no longer individuals, but stock types, for whatever may be said concerning the beauty of Imogen and Perdita and Miranda these women have not the same features as their elder sisters of the late sixteenth century. Shakespeare is evidently growing tired. He repeats himself again and again. Iago is weakened in Iachimo; Othello's story is travestied in that of Cleontes; the shipwreck of Pericles is utilized once more for The Tempest. For once, in The Winter's Tale, Shakespeare reaches his old note of power when he introduces Autolycus, who blesses his stars he is not a simple man, but, in spite of this and of the beautiful verse, The Winter's Tale is not a well-constructed play. Peculiarly enough The Tempest is the one play of Shakespeare's in which he keeps to the pseudo-classical unities, and one wonders if here he was writing for a more cultured audience, an audience which would be inclined to appreciate more the subservience to rules. Whatever classicism is in the form, however, there is none in the treatment. A mythic isle—Shakespeare does not seem to know whether it be situate in the Mediterranean or in the West Indies—a magician, an airy sprite, a monster of the earth, people lost and found, a novel love scene, all is here that could please the new taste. There is an atmosphere of impossibility in this play, and although Shakespeare by what we may call his transcendental idealism has made of this one of his greatest masterpieces we must recognize that the type, as a type, is lower than any which hitherto he had attempted. Artificiality breathes over the whole.

ROMANTIC COMEDY & TRAGI-COMEDY

(iv) THE DEVELOPMENT OF ROMANTIC DRAMA

With infinite variations, now becoming as in The Tempest almost symbolic, now approaching the sphere of comedy proper, and now moving into more tragic realms, the romantic tragi-comedy continued to develop in the seventeenth century. Thomas Dekker started his dramatic work in 1599 with The Pleasant Comedie of Old Fortunatus (printed 1600), a play which in many ways anticipates the spirit of The Tempest. The mingling of mortal and supernatural creations, the rich poetry couched in language of a peculiarly fanciful sort, and the employment of magic show the intimate relationship between the spirit of the two plays. Of the less romantically fantastic types of this form of drama Massinger's efforts are interesting examples. The Bond Man: An Antient Story (1623; printed 1624) presents the rising of Syracusan slaves under Marullo, who turns out to be a Theban who is seeking to avenge on Leosthenes the latter's desertion of his sister. The plot is complicated by Marullo's love for Cleora, the new betrothed of Leosthenes, and there is a subplot dealing with the disagreeable Corisca, wife of Creon, who attempts to draw her stepson into sin. No play, perhaps, better illustrates the descent of drama than does this. The construction is excellent; some of the dialogue comes very close to the level of Shakespeare's verse; but the characters are artificial, and the tone of high moral force has disappeared entirely. Even Marullo's seemingly noble passion for Cleora has something in it of a hypocritical and prurient colouring. In The Renegado, A Tragæcomedie (1624; printed 1630) there are many of the same features. The play hovers constantly on the verge of tragedy in spite of the comic scenes in which Gazet appears, but in the end Vitelli and his Turkish love Donusa are saved by the conscience-stricken renegade Grimaldi. Particularly interesting in this play is the Catholic atmosphere, the whole drama turning on Christian sentiments. The general atmosphere of the work is fine and full of passion, but with the sudden tragi-comic conclusion, there is the usual falling-off in the last act. Love passion, chaste and licentious, added to the usual disquisitions upon morality and virtue fill The Maid of Honour (printed 1632). Clearly there are to be seen here the stock situations and the stock characters of this type of drama. There is the usual unhappy but honest lover, Adorni, a pathetic figure; there is the usual comic character in Signior Sylli; there is the licentious lover in Fulgentio, the noble heroine in Camiola, the headstrong king in Roberto, and the amorous woman in Aurelia. In spite of many beautifully written passages, these stereotyped figures detract from our interest in the play as a whole. Romantic sentiment and talk of nobility occupy, too, most of The Bashful Lover (1636; printed 1655). Once more stock characters are in evidence. Maria is the typical wronged maiden, and Ascanio the equally typical licentious gallant struck in the end with thoughts of conscience. The emotions of the reader, however, are hardly ever moved in this play, the general tendency of Caroline drama to talk endlessly on matters of passion leaving the dialogue chill and unenthusiastic.

BRITISH DRAMA

As a whole Massinger is one of the best of those who attempted this style of dramatic writing. His atmosphere is less vitiated than that of Fletcher and Shirley, but even in him the general degeneracy of the theatre is quite evident. He repeats his characters, as he repeats his themes. The profound and deep-felt passion that is to be found in Shakespeare has, in his pages, given way to rhetoric. Even his virtue is felt at times to be a thing external, a thing to be talked about rather than to be felt. Above all, in the unnatural conclusions to his plays we discern the loss of the greater spirit which made possible the terror of King Lear and the tremendous close of Othello.

There are upward of twenty dramatists who approached this style of drama in the thirty years between 1610 and 1640. Only a few of these can find mention here.

Thomas Middleton and William Rowley are associated by collaboration as are Fletcher and Massinger. Both are rather more important for their purely comic work than for their efforts in the sphere of tragi-comedy. The 138

ROMANTIC COMEDY & TRAGI-COMEDY

Mayor of Quinborough (printed 1661, but probably one of Middleton's earliest efforts), A Tragi-Coomodie, Called the Witch (printed 1778, written by Middleton), A Faire Quarrell (printed 1617, by Middleton and Rowley), The Spanish Gipsie (1621-2; printed 1653, a joint effort), all call for attention in this section. The Mayor of Quinborough is the weakest of them all, presenting crude farce of the roughest form alongside of dismal tragedy. Only some few passages of startling poetry merit notice in it. In mentioning this play, attention might be drawn to the numberless dramatic fashions of the time. Ancient Britain called many of the dramatists to turn their eyes upon Geoffrey of Monmouth and his companions, so that this play, Lear, Cymbeline, Bonduca, and a host of other tragedies and tragi-comedies appear between 1606 and 1616. This is only one of the similar movements of the time, perhaps indicative of the general decay of independence and individuality in the age.¹ The Witch, considered as a work of art, is but a pitiful production, although its connexion with Macbeth will always cause interest to be taken in it, and its melodramatic features are eminently typical of certain tendencies of the time. The story of the play, complicated by a series of cross-currents, is, briefly, that a Duke, who has slain his Duchess's father, bids her pledge his health in a cup made of her father's skull. The Duchess, annoyed at this flamboyant humour, seeks means to poison her husband, thinks he is dead, but returns to his grace when it is found that the dose has not been sufficiently strong to prove fatal. Naturally, out of a theme such as this little of true dramatic worth could spring. With A Fair Quarrel we reach a different world entirely, and it is legitimate to argue that Rowley was responsible for many of the more brilliant passages in this play and in those which follow. In A Fair Quarrel the scene is not romantically set in some Eastern empire, but the general atmosphere of sentiment connects this drama with the other plays we have been considering. Three separate plots are to be traced in the work, two of which are of minor importance. It is the third which is of value. The duel of Captain Ager with the Colonel, Lady Ager's despair and her attempt to prevent the duel from taking place, remove us to a realm far enough away from the vapid rhetoric of so many of the dramatists of the period. We feel here the presence of a mind purer and deeper thinking than is to be discovered among the Fletchers and Shirleys of Caroline days. The Changeling has something of the same power, although it is expressed in a different way. Once more we can trace Rowley's influence, if not in the actual wording at least in the conception of character. It is not too much to say that the most subtle character-drawing in Caroline drama is to be found in this tragedy, which will later be considered in more detail. The Spanish Gipsy is an excellently written tragi-comedy. Alvarez and Pretiosa are disguised as gipsies; they are eventually discovered, and the latter marries Don John. With this main theme goes another, wherein the licentious Roderigo deflowers Clara, but, repentance-struck, ultimately marries her. Comic relief is presented in Sancho and Soto. There are no outstanding characters here, although Pretiosa is a living type, but the general high tone of the work, even in spite of hackneyed situation, reflects credit on these two collaborators.

¹ Cf. infra, p. 175.

BRITISH DRAMA

Among those who, later, did most to cultivate this form of drama might be numbered Thomas Ford, William Shirley, and Sir William D'Avenant, the last-mentioned destined to prove one of the main links between the earlier and the later Caroline eras. Ford's activity was confined mainly to the sphere of the horror tragedy, but in two dramas, The Fancies, Chast and Noble (printed 1638) and The Ladies Triall (1638; printed 1639), he associated himself with the Beaumont and Fletcher romance. In both of these we move away from the higher nobility of Rowley and Middleton. The Fancies seems to exist for indelicate situations. The three nieces of Octavio, Marquis of Siena, kept in seclusion and not revealed as his relations, as well as the character of Flavia, sold by her husband to a lord of the Court, afford the author plenty of opportunity for indulging in those indelicately passionate scenes more fully expressed in his tragedies. Decadence in Ford had firmly set its seal upon the age. The Lady's Trial is slightly more healthy in tone, but the characters are hopelessly artificial and stereotyped. Aurelio is the usual faithful friend; Adorni the usual licentious lover; Spinella the inevitable injured heroine; and Auria the equally inevitable jealous husband. Except for a few passages of extraordinary beauty of language, the play has little merit; it is one of the mechanically conceived and mechanically constructed dramas of the age.

ROMANTIC COMEDY & TRAGI-COMEDY

Shirley's work in this style is in bulk greater than any of the others save that of Fletcher. Over half a score of his plays can be classed in this romantic tragi-comedy section, although not one of them stands forward as a masterpiece. They have a hopeless similarity one to another, and display lack of individuality in the treatment of character and of theme. Shirley, we may say, is the last great poet of the 'Elizabethan' era, but how far he has sunk can be realized by a glance at even the best of his works. Of these romantic comedies perhaps the best are The Brothers (1626; printed 1653), Changes: Or, Love in a Maze (1632), The Young Admirall (1633; printed 1637), and The Gamester (1633; printed 1637). The first deals with the stock figure of a tyrannical father and the true love of Felisarda and Fernando. Some scenes in it are cleverly written, but the romantic portion of the plot is somewhat dull and uninteresting. Changes deals more entirely with the world of wit, and, were it not for some serious scenes, might be classed with the more comic productions of Shirley's pen. The Young Admiral, albeit the figures are mechanically conceived, is a much finer play than either of the other two. The complicated plot is excellently managed, and Rosinda's character has some features that call for praise. It is much healthier in tone than that which succeeded it, The Gamester. Comedy, pathos, indelicacy, coarseness, and rhetorical sentiment mingle in this drama. The plot, given to the dramatist by King Charles himself, is excellently worked out, but the failure of the age is seen in the decadent tone of much of the dialogue and in the general inability of the playwright to rise above hackneyed situation. The 'roaring' scenes, for example, which provide a good deal of the comic interest, are obviously reminiscent of many similar scenes in earlier dramas. It is useless noting further Shirley's romantic works. Nearly all of them, The Gratefull Servant (printed 1630), The Bird in a Cage (printed 1633), The Opportunitie (printed 1640), and the rest, show similar intermingling of high poetry, rhetorical sentiment, and indelicate, coarse, and decadent imaginings.

BRITISH DRAMA

With D'Avenant's The Platonick Lovers (printed 1636) and Love and Honour (1634; printed 1649) we reach the point where the purely romantic tragi-comedy tends to move into the world of the heroic drama. In the elaboration of platonic sentiment in the first, and the theme (Love and Honour) of the second, we come very close to the spirit of Dryden and of Orrery. The Theander and Eurithea of The Platonic Lovers are not far removed from Almanzor and Almahide, and Love and Honour is full of that lofty, inflated heroic diction so typical of the later drama. As we shall find, the heroic tragedy or tragi-comedy is a direct descendant of the tragi-comic atmosphere inaugurated by Beaumont and Fletcher in 1611 and hinted at even in the mid-sixteenth century in the tragi-comic interludes.

Of the lesser writers of this time there are many, but few require even mention here. Robert Davenport contributed an interesting specimen of this drama in The City Night-Cap: Or, Crede quod habes, & habes (1624; printed 1661), a peculiar play written in more than ordinarily fine blank verse. The main theme is taken from Cervantes' oft-used tale of the Curioso Impertinente. Lorenzo, a typically jealous husband, bids Philipppo tempt his wife Abstemia. She is honest, but Lorenzo, in the madness of his fever, suborns slaves to witness against her. She leaves the city for Milan, but is eventually reconciled to her husband. Opposed to this is a contrary story in which the over-trusting Lodovico allows all liberty to his priggish wife Dorothea. She sins with Francisco and confesses her fault to her husband when he comes to her disguised as a friar. Several of the scenes remind us of the brothel portions of Pericles and of The Woman Hater; these, like the more serious portions of the drama, are well written. As a whole it is one of the best of the plays of this kind written during the period. Thomas Rawlins' The Rebellion (1639; printed 1640) is a much less capably written play, but it is interesting as showing the elaboration of those tricks of the stage with which the Restoration drama was filled. Pathos appears in the love of Giovanni and Evadne, and there are the usual low-comedy scenes beloved by audiences of the time in the tailors, who remind us of Dekker's shoemakers. It is the stage trappings, however that call for most attention—a city besieged, bandits, a Machiavellian villain, jealousies, class pride, prisons, rescues, disguisings—all mingled into a singularly romantic plot. With The Queene of Arragon (printed 1640) of William Habington we move into the sphere of Dryden's Secret Love. The witty, frivolous Cleantha is conceived in his style. This maiden is pursued by Sanmartino; she succeeds in cheating him and marries Oniate. The more serious portion of the play deals with the magnanimous sentimental loves of Decastro, Ascanio, and Florentio for the Queen. In its union of wit and of heroic idealism it directly anticipates what was to prove one of the most popular forms of Restoration drama. Many are the dramas of the time which adopt something of the same atmosphere. Sir William Berkeley's The Lost Lady (printed 1638) is a fairly well-written specimen of the class, with an excellently drawn character in Hermione. The device of the heroine, however, in her disguise as a Moor, removes the theme of the play far from the realms of probability. The Jealous Lovers (printed 1632) of Thomas Randolph and The Royall Slave (1636; printed 1639) of William Cartwright might likewise be mentioned as typical examples of this essentially Caroline form of drama.

ROMANTIC COMEDY & TRAGI-COMEDY

The actual examination of particular plays is of less importance than the grasping of the salient characteristics of the group. As has been shown, the tendency is constantly toward the hopelessly unreal and the impossible. The plots are full of the most artificial and startling devices ; the characters are no longer individualized, but reduced to the level of mere types. In some of the later plays, too, a movement can be seen which led ultimately to the elaboration of heroic sentiment and heroic proportions in the plays of the Restoration. It will further be noted that even in the early seventeenth century this tragi-comedy broke into two clearly marked divisions, each destined to be the forerunner of a definite type of drama in after years. The term tragi-comedy may apply to plays of the type of A King and No King, where the atmosphere is almost wholly serious, but the conclusion moderately happy ; it may also apply to plays such as The Queen of Arragon, where a comic plot moves forward alongside of a tragic. The first is the predecessor of the heroic drama proper ; the second leads toward the 'mixed' species patronized in his early days by Dryden, and by Etherege in The Comical Revenge. The important point to notice in all this development is the weakening of true dramatic conception. Shakespeare, in spite of his few lapses, had shown clearly the main scope of great drama ; his successors, writing for a less manly public, lost sight of his high purpose. The extravagant conclusions, introduced for the sake of novelty, destroyed the atmosphere of many of the plays ; the crude intermingling of tragedy and of comedy gave an effect that may have interested the audiences of the time, but which we can never accept as a true purpose in dramatic art.

BRITISH DRAMA

(v) PASTORAL PLAYS

With these romantic tragi-comedies may possibly be taken the various pastoral plays written between 1600 and 1642. Shakespeare's sixteenth-century comedies, no doubt, were pastoral in a sense, but their pastoralism was not wholly out of touch with reality. In the years that followed, this element, which seems to have a perennial attraction for ages of Court corruption and decadent life, came to assume more artificial features, and to this it may have been led partly by the immense interest taken in the many romances of a similar atmosphere which catered for the requirements of a leisured reading public. Ben Jonson descended from his bitter portraiture of contemporary follies to pen The Sad Shepherd (printed 1641), Shirley moved into the same world in A Pastorall called the Arcadia (printed 1640), Fletcher adopted it in The Faithful Shepheardesse (printed 1629), Randolph in his Amyntas or The Impossible Dowry (printed 1638), an adaptation of Tasso's famous dramatic poem Aminta, and Rutter used the pastoral conventions for his Shepherds Holy-Day (printed 1635). Again and again the writers of the time, in prose romance, in lyric ecstasy, in more ambitious stanzaic poem, essayed this style, bringing to it often something of beauty, but displaying in their concentration upon a form of art which gives no scope for realistic passion the gradually narrowing limits of their genius. Amongst all the works of this kind the efforts of Ben Jonson and of Fletcher have become deservedly the most famous. There is apparent in their works a charm of expression and a beauty of conception lacking in the plays of the others. At the same time, even the best plays of this class have about them an atmosphere of artificiality, which effectually prevents any pastoral play reaching the summits of literary expression. Pastoral, after all, remains a poet's game, and while it may be pleasant for a winter hour or so to imagine that Et ego in Arcadia one always feels that this form of art is weak and lacking in interest. Charm it may have, and prettiness of a Watteauesque pattern, but never profound thought and high passion. Pan and his nymphs, Chloris and Corydon, pass into forgetfulness before the breezy laughter of a Falstaff or the tragic terror of a Lear.

ROMANTIC COMEDY & TRAGI-COMEDY

CHAPTER III

REALISTIC COMEDY AND SATIRICAL PLAYS

SHAKESPEARE AND JONSON

ALWAYS opposed to the artificiality of the romantic tragi-comedy and of the pastoral drama is to be found in the seventeenth century the realistic comedy. It has already been seen how in the late sixteenth century the realistic farce, deriving its tone from the earlier interludes, had preserved an independent existence alongside of the romantic comedy patronized by Greene and Lyly. This earlier form of realistic play, often with close reminiscences of the Latin drama, was adopted by many dramatists in the last years of Elizabeth's reign, and was carried forward by them until Jonson came to set his seal upon the type and give it a strength and a purpose which previously it had only too often lacked.

Among these earlier dramatists Shakespeare, naturally, calls for first attention, for in The Taming of the Shrew (c. 1595 ; printed 1623) and in A most pleasaunt and excellent conceited Comedie, of Syr Iohn Falstaffe, and the merrie Wiues of Windsor (c. 1599 ; printed 1602) he produced two of the most capable and interesting works of this type written in the last years of the century. Both of these are reworkings of older dramas, the first of a still extant Taming of A Shrew, and the second of a play now lost—probably, according to the theory of recent investigators, of The Jealous Comedy mentioned in Henslowe's Diary. The exact amount of Shakespearian dialogue in each has been a point of controversy for many years. Some would give to Shakespeare the two 'Shrew' plays, others would deny that he wrote anything but a few lines of the later one ; Falstaff in The Merry Wives seems to many a travesty of the fat knight of Henry IV, to many he seems a truly Shakespearian figure. The plays, however, always remain, and remain as excellent acting farces, displaying the hand, if not of Shakespeare entirely, at least of an exceedingly capable playwright who knew the requirements and exigencies of the Elizabethan stage. Both plays are marked by many more local touches than any other of Shakespeare's known workmanship ; the scenes of both are essentially middle-class ; the language is more boisterous ; the action is less restrained and less coloured by romantic sentiment. There is a complete chasm between the scenes of these plays and, for example, the Sir Toby scenes of Twelfth Night or the Bottom scenes of A Midsummer Night's Dream. In the latter we are in the presence of Shakespeare's humour ; in the former there is only the more farcical and the more realistic type of comic dialogue and of comic characterization. These plays may be taken as typical of a number of others of kindred features ; good acting farces, with entertainingly comic scenes and occasionally well-drawn characters, with many reminiscences of Terentian and Plautan comedy, but frequently lacking unity of aim and without any higher appeal.

146

REALISTIC COMEDY & SATIRICAL PLAYS

To Ben Jonson belongs the credit of infusing into this form of drama a richer and a deeper note. Jonson, intimately conversant with the life of his own time, a man closely associated with the theatre, and, although boasting no university degree, steeped in the literatures of classic times, was eminently fitted to carry out his self-appointed task. He appeared at a time when the University Wits and Shakespeare, their hated follower, were establishing upon the stage the romantic comedy and the flamboyant tragedy. He looked round him and saw the classic precision he adored being crushed out of existence in the face of more popular tendencies. He found a romantic comedy he must have regarded as foolish, a farcical type lacking in definite purpose, a crude revenge tragedy full of romantic grotesqueries, and a superman tragedy wanting in all calmness and restraint. Boldly, as was his way, he set himself to cure the theatrical evils of the time by establishing a comic and a tragic form based on classic example. In the latter endeavour he had no success ; in the former he succeeded in making himself the greatest figure of his age.

BRITISH DRAMA

It is undeniable that his efforts were tentative. We know that he had written many plays before the appearance of the first version of Every Man in his Humour in 1598; we can see how his ideas, or his daring, developed between the publication of that first version and the issue of the 1616 edition of his Works. Indeed, while glancing at the plays written between 1595 and 1600 we may even come to the conclusion that this pioneer was anticipated and maybe was influenced by other contemporaries, including at their head the robust figure of George Chapman. On the other hand, whatever tentative movements we discover in his art and whatever influence of others we find, Jonson will always remain the chief and dominating dramatist of the satirical comedy.

His extant plays are readily divisible into one or two well-marked groups. The masques, the one unfinished pastoral, and the tragedies stand each by themselves. In the realm of comedy we find The Case is Altered (printed 1609, but possibly acted about 1597), Every Man in his Humor (acted 1598; printed in two versions, 1601 and 1616), The Comicall Satyre of Every Man Out Of his Humor (1599; printed 1600), The Fountaine of Selfe-Loue. Or Cynthia's Reuels (c. 1600; printed 1601), Poetaster or The Arraignement (1601; printed 1602), Volpone Or The Foxe (1606; printed 1607), Epicoene, Or The silent Woman (1609; printed 1616), The Alchemist (1610; printed 1612), Bartholomew Fayre (1614; printed 1631), The Diuell is an Asse (1616; printed 1631), The Staple of Newes (1625; printed 1631), The Magnetick Lady: Or, Humors Reconci'd (printed 1640), and A Tale of a Tub (printed 1640). There is an obvious gap between the first five and the rest, so that the four famous later plays, Volpone, Epicoene, The Alchemist, and Bartholomew Fair fall into a group by themselves. For our purpose it may be well to start with the revised (1616) version of what is Jonson's most famous play, Every Man in his Humour. The very title of this play shows us Jonson's aim in characterization. He endeavours to harmonize a medieval medical conceit with the methods employed in the Latin theatre. For the Middle Ages the 'humours' or natural moistures of the brain governed a man's nature ; too much of one, or a shifting of the due proportions governing normality, would produce eccentricity of one sort or another. Thus melancholy, greed, timorousness, choler, all were 'humours,' and the person who exhibited any of these was described as 'humorous.' It is obvious that if art is to make use of these humours it has to depart to a certain extent from the more individual portraiture of separate men and women. It has to deal with a type, not with a personality. This is precisely what Terence did in his dramas. His testy old fathers are all the same, his cunning slaves have all the same features ; he seizes, that is to say, some salient feature of a class of men and produces his characters to pattern. This method Jonson, being a classicist, determined to follow. Still further, he determined to carry into practice a time-honoured dictum of classical critics. Every one who had written about comedy had assumed that the object of this form of drama was to ridicule the vices of men, put folly in a foolish shape before the audience, and so laugh the spectators into good behaviour. Unanimous as were the critics on this point, few dramatists had put it into practice. Jonson determined that his comedy should be a satiric comedy ; and for that purpose the humours gave him the very tool he required. All satire depends upon exaggeration, and by exaggerating his eccentricities Jonson was able to produce exactly the effect at which he aimed.

REALISTIC COMEDY & SATIRICAL PLAYS

When we come to view this particular comedy of Jonson's we see the way in which he has realized his ideal. His drama is no longer merely farcical ; it is written with a purpose. He has allied scholarship with art and made his humours real. Here, declares the author himself in his prologue, are no impossible romantic episodes, no stage tricks, no fantastic fripperies,

But deedes, and language, such as men doe vse :
And persons, such as Comædie would chuse.
When she would shew an Image of the times,
And sport with humane follies, not with crimes.

BRITISH DRAMA

The follies of a braggadocio, of a tyrannous father, of a jealous husband, all are put before us; the ruling eccentricities of the age are mocked out of court. This mention of the typical characters of the play may lead us to inquire exactly into Jonson's merits. We see in the dramatis personæ very little beyond anglicized figures taken from Latin comedy. Bobadill and Kiteley and Brainworm all have their prototypes in the dramatic works of Terence. May we not say, therefore, that Jonson is more of an adapter than of an individual dramatist? Does this not betoken a fatal lack of inventiveness on his part? Moreover, when we come to analyse the plot of the play we find many points wherein the author has fallen short of his ideal. One may suffice as an example. He believes in unity of construction; yet Every Man in his Humour is by no means an artistic whole. For the first scenes our interest centres upon Knowell, for the rest it centres upon Knowell's son. There are in the play, therefore, two spheres of interest, just as there are in the later play Bartholomew Fair, and our impression of the play as a whole is weakened thereby. There can be no denial that Jonson, in spite of his high art and his constant care, often proves himself artistically at fault. At the same time, his skill in making the old humours live, his vivid observation of contemporary life, his penetrating insight into the vices of his age, distinguish his plays as well above the usual level of the time. Jonson is a magnificent satirist. He has just that power of revealing the salient features and of repressing the points not required for his portrait which characterize the work of the greatest satirists of classical times and later. Unlike Shakespeare, he had the true satirist's horror of traits which he himself possessed. Boastful and arrogant, he hated boastfulness and arrogance; mixing in the amusements of tavern life, he yet hated many of the things he saw there. Like the other satirists, he had the power of recognizing his own follies and vices in others. Moreover, Jonson was a true dramatist. Some of his later plays may be weak and even uninteresting; but in Every Man in his Humour and in the other comedies which rank with this he displays his vast power over a kind of theatrical wit. His plays are not witty as are the comedies of the Restoration writers, but he is able to get an infinite deal of fun out of stage situation allied to character. His witticisms are not, to employ French terminology, the result of the mot d'esprit, but of the mot de caractère and the mot de situation. There is a great amount of this in the scenes where Stephen and Matthew appear. Thus, for example, in Act III, Scene 1, Bobadill is discoursing of his prowess, and Edward Knowell is leading him on, the two gulls listening eagerly.

REALISTIC COMEDY & SATIRICAL PLAYS

Bob. Oh lord, sir? by S. George, I was the first man, that entred the breach: and, had I not effected it with resolution, I had beene slaine, if I had had millions of liues.

E. Kn. 'Twas pittie, you had not ten; a cats, and your owne, ifaith. But, was it possible?

(Mat. ' Pray you, marke this discourse, sir.

Step. So, I doe.)

Another example of the same type of wit is to be found at the close of Act IV, Scene 2, when Bobadill draws in affected anger.

E. Kn. Gentlemen, forbear, I pray you.

Bob. Well, sirrah, you, Holofernes: by my hand, I will pinck your flesh, full of holes, with my rapier for this; I will, by this good heauen: Nay, let him come, let him come, gentlemen, by the body of Saint George, Ile not kill him.

It is touches such as these which show Jonson as the true dramatist.

That Jonson moved into this world of contemporary London life only by slow gradations is made clear by the fact that the first quarto of Every Man in his Humour is set in Italy with all the characters Italian, and by the additional facts that The Case is Altered is scened in Milan, and Every Man out of his Humour is in an undetermined locality with characters mainly of Italian titles. Cynthia's Revels has, moreover, its scene in "Gargaphie," and Poetaster is set in a fanciful Rome. The change from this sphere of fantastic satire to the realistic note of the 1616 Every Man in his Humour and Bartholomew Fair came to Jonson only later in life. His art at first was influenced by the more imaginative and romantic touches apparent in such plays as Love's Labour's Lost in the late sixteenth century.

BRITISH DRAMA

This is particularly noticeable in Jonson's first (extant) comedy, The Case is Altered, where Juniper and Onion are made instruments to satirize speech fashions of the day just as the various comic characters are in Love's Labour's Lost. There may be a touch of ridicule in the romantic plot of this drama, with its theme of a child lost at birth and reappearing to a distressed father and of a highborn maiden brought up, in ignorance of her parentage, in the hut of a miserly beggar, but after all Jonson got his theme from good classical sources, the Aulularia and the Captivi. The main interest of the piece, however, does not lie in its romantic episodes; the author's chief care was given to the more humorous figures of Juniper, Onion, and Jaques. There may be noted here a frequent failing in Jonson's art. Finely neo-classical as he is, and careful over the construction of his plots, he often allows his personal bitterness to interfere with his artistry. Thus in this particular play the first scene opens to introduce us to a gentleman named Antonio Balladino, who is readily recognized as the contemporary poet and dramatist, Anthony Munday. We are led to expect that Balladino will play a prominent part in the development of the story, but he never reappears. Jonson had had his fling at his rival and let him go, careless of the consequences to his art.

This personal bitterness with less interference with the conduct of the plot appears again in Every Man out of his Humour, in which unquestionably Clove is meant as a satirical portrait of Marston, Carlo Buffone of a certain Charles Chester, and Puntarvolo presumably of Sir Walter Raleigh. The plot of this comedy is at one and the same time of the most subtle and delicate structure and of the most mechanical form. We can see here, as we cannot see in Shakespeare's plays, the working of intellect behind the dramatis personæ, and even while we admire the sheer cleverness of Jonson's invention we feel that there is not here present that higher imagination which conceived the more organic unities of Shakespeare's works. The presenting of the various humours as outhumoured at the last, and the final triumph that lies in the outhumouring of the outhumourer is excellently carried through, so that this stands as one of the most brilliant of Jonson's plays. Hardly any comedy so abounds in critical dicta as does this ; it is Jonson's first real challenge to his contemporaries. He gives us here his well-known definition of a humour :

REALISTIC COMEDY & SATIRICAL PLAYS

As when some one peculiar quality
Doth so possesse a man, that it doth draw
All his affects, his spirits, and his powers
In their conductions all to runne one way.
This may be truly said to be a Humor,
But that a Rooke in wearing a pide feather,
The cable hatband, or the three-pild ruffe,
A yard of shoe-tie, or the Switzers knot
On his French garters, should affect a Humor,
O, 'tis more than most ridiculous.

So, too, he opens a discussion on the nature of comedy, and shows plainly his detestation of the common romantic business of the age in the words of Mites, who complains

That the argument of his Comedie might haue been of some other nature, as of a Duke to be in loue with a Countesse, & that Countesse to be in loue with the Dukes son, & the son to loue the Ladies waiting maid : some such crosse woeing, with a Clowne to their seruing man, better than to be thus neare and familiarly allied to the time, and in Cordatus' answer he displays his own attitude :

You say well, but I would faine heare one of these Autumne-iudgements define once, Quid sit Comædia ? if he cannot, let him content himselfe with Cicero's definition (till he haue strength to propose to himself a better) who would haue a Comedie to be Imitatio vitæ, Speculum Consuetudinis, Imago veritatis, a thing throughout pleasant and ridiculous, and accomodated to the correction of manners.

With Cynthia's Revels Jonson shows a certain decadence in his art. His treatment of the allegorical and mythical material is uninspired and uninteresting, although the opening with its pleasant little ditty sung by Echo is charming enough. Again satire of literary oddities and of literary rivals fills almost the entirety of the play. Poetaster continues in the same strain, Marston as Crispinus occupying the centre of the story, with Dekker as Demetrius Fannius, his second in command. Jonson himself is presented as the poet Horace. There are some good things in this comedy, but as a whole it fails to arouse in us the interest excited by a reading of Every Man in his Humour. The satire was growing too strong for the author. The men who "did provoke" him "with their petulant stiles on every stage" had made him forget the best of his art.

BRITISH DRAMA

Jonson's next play, Volpone, has none of this personal bitterness, but there is instead a marked deepening of his hatred at the follies and vices of his time. Hardly a single character in the whole play is virtuous or honest. Volpone himself, Corbaccio, Voltore, Lady Politick Would-bee, and the rest are rapacious, licentious, vicious, so that the play as a whole, although it is excellently constructed and has a unity of aim finer than that of any of Jonson's previous plays, shows both the growing corruption of the age and the natural tendency of the satirist to widen his range of observation and to intensify in his own mind the vices at which he merely mocked before. So Swift passed from the land of Lilliput to the country of the Houyhnhnms. This note of deepened horror is continued in The Alchemist and in Bartholomew Fair, two of his finest comedies. In the former all the men are either rascally or avaricious, the women vain and libertine; in the latter Jonson's lash falls with no sparing hand upon the Puritans and on current hypocrisy. These are among the best comedies in the English language, but the coarseness and even the brutality of Jonson's later style detract considerably from their beauty. There is not here the high idealism of a Swift to atone for the ugliness; there is only the rather rough disgust of a robust but unrefined man at "vulgar errors."

(ii) CHAPMAN AND DEKKER

Apart from Epicoene, a singularly bright comedy in the midst of this darkness, Jonson's work finished with these plays. His later comedies are all weak and marred by exaggeration and extravagance. In these earlier works, however, he had set his mark on the age, and many essayed to follow him in his own style. Among these the classically minded George Chapman is by no means the least. Chapman was born about 1560, and was writing for the stage in 1596; he died in 1634. Of his plays the earliest extant is The Blinde Begger of Alexandria, most pleasantly discoursing his variable humours in disguised shapes full of Conceite and pleasure (1596; printed 1598). This is followed by a series of others: A pleasant Comedy entituled: An Humorous dayes Myrth (1597; printed 1599), The Gentleman Usher (c. 1602; printed 1606), Al Fooles (c. 1604; printed 1605), Monsieur D'Olive (1604; printed 1606), Eastward Hoe (1605; printed in 1605 as by Chapman, Jonson, and Marston), May-Day (c. 1609; printed 1611), The Widdowes Teares (c. 1609; printed 1612), as well as The Ball (1632; printed 1639), written in collaboration with Shirley. The first of these is a poor work, and shows the twin influence of the romantic and realistic schools. The blind beggar is a certain Cleanthes in disguise, a noble banished and beloved by Queen Ægiale. This gentleman seems to have a propensity for masquerades, for in the course of the play he appears as a Count and as Leon, marrying in these shapes both Elimine and Samathis. In the end, as Cleanthes, he defeats the enemies of Egypt and succeeds in providing his superfluous wives with husbands in the persons of a couple of kings. An Humorous Day's Mirth shows a slight advance in its well-developed plot and interestingly displayed characters. This progress is still further marked in The Gentleman Usher, a comedy full of humorous types; the plot is certainly of the tragicomic sort, but the dramatis personæ belong mainly to the school of Jonson. In it Alphonso is an old duke who loves Margaret; the latter's affections are placed on Alphonso's son, Vincentio. Vincentio is aided by Strozza and persuades Bassiolo, the usher, to act for him. Alphonso's tool is Medice, who attempts the lives of both Strozza and Vincentio. Alongside of this romantic plot move the elderly, sack-loving widow Corteza, the foolish

REALISTIC COMEDY & SATIRICAL PLAYS

BRITISH DRAMA

Pogio, and the pedant Sarpego—a character, be it remarked, who bears a striking resemblance to old Polonius. All Fools marks a culmination in this upward movement. Here a certain spice of poetic fantasy is added to the realistic treatment of a theme taken from Heautontimoroumenos, but influenced unquestionably by Every Man out of his Humour. The plot is an interesting one, carried along two distinct lines. In the one, Gostanzo, the testy old father of the gay Valerio, who is married secretly to Gratiana, and of Bellanora, beloved by Fortunio, elder son of the indulgent Marc Antonio, tries his best to govern his children. His younger son, Rinaldo, informs him that Gratiana is married to Fortunio; nothing suspecting, he takes them to his house and there sees his own son Valerio kissing the wife. He is further deceived into telling Marc Antonio that the girl is married to his son. The other plot deals with the jealous Cornelio, baited by the rascally Rinaldo and Valerio. In the attempt to show various humours, and, further, in the effort to show those humours out-humoured, Chapman displays clearly his debt to Jonson's example. Monsieur D'Olive is somewhat more in the strain of The Gentleman Usher, the plot being partly serious in its development. Marcellina, owing to the jealousy of Count Vaumont, has vowed eternal seclusion. So, too, because of the death of his wife, Count S. Anne mourns constantly in solitude. Vandome discovers that the last mentioned is beloved by Eurione, and by a trick he draws the two hermits from their self-appointed retirement. This serious plot is coloured constantly by the humour surrounding Monsieur D'Olive, who is gulled by Rhoderique and Mugeron into believing he is a wit. In this play, as is evident, Chapman comes nearest to the romantic tragicomic strain then so much in fashion. The compositely written Eastward Ho is a definite return to realism, allied to a moralizing touch in the presentation of the good apprentice Golding, marrying his master's daughter and loaded with honours, and of Quicksilver, rioting his goods away and ending in the hands of the watch. The plot is one of vice and folly, the various humours being well hit off although not so exaggerated as are those in Jonson's comedies. A similar series of follies and vices is presented in May Day, with its boasting soldier in Quintiliano, a brother of Bobadill, its licentious old sinner in Lodovico and its rascally serving-men. The Widow's Tears is more interestingly individual. The plot of this, albeit set in some romantic realm, is thoroughly realistic. Tharsalio, the blunt wooer, wins, contrary to all belief, the newly widowed Countess Eudora, and Cynthia, Lysander's wife, shows a readiness to fall in love soon after her husband's death. The two women are intended to represent the weakness and fickleness of the female sex, Chapman's feelings in this regard being similar to those of Jonson; and his bitterness becomes almost nauseating in the tomb scene, where Cynthia embraces an unknown soldier in the very presence of her husband's coffin. The ugliness of the scene is, however, mitigated by the delightful ruse by which the wife, in imminent danger of being exposed, turns the tables nimbly upon her rightfully wrathful husband. Of The Ball it is impossible to determine accurately the portions of Chapman's and the portions of Shirley's workmanship. The theme of the play is slight, but the atmosphere of wit allied to the presentation of interesting characters in Mr Bostock and Colonel Winfield mark out the play as one of the best of Caroline comedies. It will be noted here that the general tone of comedy has considerably changed from the tone apparent in Chapman's early works. In general, Chapman shows himself one of the most capable dramatists of his time, a trifle heavy and rough on occasion, but with a fund of humour and a classically trained mind which can well determine the just proportions of a dramatic plot.

REALISTIC COMEDY & SATIRICAL PLAYS

Along with him one might associate Jonson's hated rival, Thomas Dekker, one of the freshest and most delightful, if by no means one of the most gifted, theatrical writers of the time. Of his comic pieces The Pleasant Comedie of Old Fortunatus (1599; printed 1600) is a charmingly poetical piece, but his general style lay rather in the direction of realism. This style is to be traced in The Shoemakers

BRITISH DRAMA

Holiday. Or The Gentle Craft (1599; printed 1600), in West-ward Hoe (1604; printed 1607 as by Dekker and Webster), in North-ward Hoe (1605; printed 1607 as by the same two writers), in The Roaring Girle. Or Moll Cut-Purse (c. 1610; printed 1611 as by Dekker and Middleton), and in one or two other plays less worthy of detailed attention. The satirical strain is evident in Satiromastix. Or The vntrussing of the Humorous Poet (1601; printed 1602), no doubt the joint reply of Dekker and Marston to Jonson's taunts in his early comedies. It has been suggested, and it is conceivably possible, that one or two of the finer scenes in this play were penned by Shakespeare himself. There is, at least, contemporary record that that poet did retaliate to Jonson's taunts, and some episodes in Satiromastix show true marks of genius. Satiromastix brings us back to Poetaster and the rest; here Horace once more symbolizes Jonson, but this time Horace is not the poet he was in the former piece, but is presented as a dogmatic, conceited little versifier who endeavours to write by the aid of intellect and a kind of riming-dictionary. No more humorous scene can be discovered in the whole of this Poetomachia than that in which Horace is introduced leaning over his manuscripts in the act of penning an ode:

O me thy Priest inspire.
 For I to thee and thine immortall name,
 In—in—in golden tunes,
 For I to thee and thine immortall name—
 In—sacred raptures flowing, flowing, swimming, swimming:
 In sacred raptures swimming,
 Immortal name, game, dame, tame, lame, lame, lame,
 Pux, hath, shame, proclaime, oh——
 In Sacred raptures flowing, will proclaime, not—— O me thy Priest inspyre!
 For I to thee and thine imortall name,
 In flowing numbers fild with spright and flame.
 Good, good, in flowing numbers fild with spright & flame.

Dekker's real gifts, however, lay not in satire, but in purely realistic comedy. In this style he does not at all follow that of Jonson; his method is not satiric, but sympathetic. He has a peculiarly broad humanitarian attitude toward life, and his forte lies in a loving description of the lower world of London. He is a sentimental realist who, instead of seeking with the satirist for the vices of life, searches for the good. This feature of his art is most evident in The Shoemakers' Holiday and in The Roaring Girl. The first of these, a deservedly popular play, introduces us to the entertaining circle of Simon Eyre and his merry shoemakers, who move in a world just tinged with the rosy hues of romance. The second presents a contemporary 'blue-stocking,' Moll Cut-purse, in a sentimental spirit which is reminiscent of the writers of the eighteenth century. She is shown not as a thief and a vicious character, but as the reliever of the distressed and the humble knight (or dame) of honour. Nowhere more clearly is the sentimental note in the age pronounced. Westward Ho and Northward Ho are more realistic in the Jonsonian sense, and are decidedly less entertaining than Dekker's earlier individual efforts.

REALISTIC COMEDY & SATIRICAL PLAYS

(iii) LATER REALISTIC COMEDY

The Jonsonian style with an added element of intrigue was taken over later by Fletcher, usually in association with Philip Massinger, and had already been adopted by Beaumont in one of his earliest dramas, The Woman Hater (c. 1606; printed 1607). This is an excellent comedy, well constructed and possessing a verve lacking in many of even the most realistic of these works. An interesting development is seen here in the elaboration of what may almost be counted a 'manners' note in the character of Oriana, with her airiness, her cleverness, and her wit; but the main atmosphere is that of 'humours,' Lazarillo, a courtier who adores strange viands, and Gondarino, the woman-hater, providing most of the vis comica of the piece. Noticeable are the Pandar scenes, which are reminiscent of the brothel scenes in Pericles, and the figures of the intelligencers, who remind us of similar characters in Much Ado. The Womans Prize, or The Tamer Tam'd (? c. 1605; printed 1647; ascribed to Fletcher alone) is a farcical sequel to The Taming of the Shrew. 'Here Petruchio is carried to London, where he marries an English wife, and is, as the title indicates, subjugated by her. In The Coxcomb (c. 1609; printed 1647; ascribed to Beaumont and Fletcher with possible revision by another) there is more of a romantic note, as there is in The Honest Mans Fortune (1613; printed 1647; ascribed to Fletcher and Massinger), but the pure comic note reappears in Wit Without Money (c. 1614; printed 1639, ascribed to Fletcher alone), where the manners style is in even greater evidence. Gaiety, not bitterness, predominates in this play, the hero being a witty, impoverished, and fearless Valentine, who is in the end captured by the widow. The anti-matrimonial mood, the wit and the lightness of heart, differentiate this play from the Jonsonian model, and provide an intermediate link between the realistic comedy of 1600 and that of 1670. More of the satiric note is struck in The Scornful Ladie (c. 1615; printed 1616; ascribed to Beaumont and Fletcher, with the possibility of a Massinger revisal). The Scornful Lady is a well-wrought comedy, although the character of the lady, who is loved by Elder Loveless, is somewhat strained. The latter, stung by her disdain, sets out on a voyage, leaving the riotous Younger Loveless his estate. News of his death is brought home, and the rascally brother rejoices. This theme is complicated not only by a series of humours in the persons of Morecraft the usurer, Abigail the wanton maid, and Savil the faithful steward debauched by Younger Loveless, but by many intrigues. After a series of disguisings and cross-purposes Elder Loveless marries the Lady; Welford, another suitor, her sister Martha; and Younger Loveless the Widow. The play is a clever one, but shows all the callousness and vice accumulating upon the age. We are far now from the pleasant freshness of All Fools or The Shoemakers' Holiday. Wit at several weapons (date uncertain; printed 1647; ascribed to Fletcher and another unidentified author) is even more Jonsonian in style. Here Sir Perfidious Oldcraft destines his niece for Sir Gregory Fopp. She eventually succeeds in marrying Cunningham. The humours of the two first named are added to by the clownish folly of Pompey

BRITISH DRAMA

160

REALISTIC COMEDY & SATIRICAL PLAYS

Doodle, the rascality of Witty-pate Oldcraft, the outworn gentility of Sir Ruinous Gentry, and the obtuseness of Credulous. Jonsonian humours of a kind come into The Little French Lawyer (c. 1619; printed 1647; ascribed to Fletcher and Massinger), particularly in the title figure of La Witt, who, from apparent timidity, develops into a braggadocio, but the atmosphere belongs in general rather to that of the romantic tragi-comedy. One of the most interesting plays of this series is The Wild-Goose Chase (1621; printed 1652; ascribed to Fletcher alone), which shows more clearly than any other play of the time the development of the manners style. The plot is one of intrigue, and humorous characteristics are to be traced in plenty, but that for which the comedy exists is the wit—no longer a wit of situation, but the genuine esprit that appears in Restoration dramas of a later date. The gaiety, the courtly dalliance, the anti-matrimonial humour of the hero, all point forward to the late seventeenth century. It was not mere chance that made Farquhar choose to adapt this play in his well-known comedy of manners, The Inconstant. This air of wit allied to high-flown theories concerning honour appears again in the tragi-comic Nice Valour or The Passionate Madman (? 1624; printed 1647; ascribed to Fletcher and another). Here Shamont, the Duke's favourite, has his mind filled with just such ideas as occupied the minds of Dryden's heroes. The portion of the play in which he and the Passionate Madman appear is more or less serious, but Jonsonian humour is shown plainly enough in the figure of Lapet, eternally engaged on his work concerning the taking of blows.

With Fletcher and his coadjutors we are no longer in the direct company of Jonson. Jonson is Elizabethan in his sturdiness, in his robust attitude toward life, Elizabethan even in his horror of vice. In Fletcher we can trace the weakening spirit of the age. Humours are copied from the earlier comedies, but not for the sake of satire; vice is indulged in for its own sake. Romanticism occasionally is employed to cover over situations nauseous and disgusting. Above all, comedy is moving in a new direction toward wit. The Cavalier intellect is demanding something more than the manifestations of the comic exhibited in Elizabethan plays. With Fletcher, as we have seen, in wit, in callousness, in refined immorality, we are travelling from the largely emotional, coarser, yet fresher drama of the late sixteenth century to the borders of that territory which Etherege, Wycherley, and Congreve made their own.

BRITISH DRAMA

In pure comedy Philip Massinger's unaided efforts have less of the airy tone infused into Fletcher's plays. He is a closer follower of Jonson's style. A New Way to Pay Old Debts (before 1626 ; printed 1633) is, indeed, one of the finest satiric dramas outside of Jonson's series. Massinger's masterpiece of portraiture is Sir Giles Overreach, a "cruel extortioner," who does not cease to live although he is a type. Overreach is, however, more individualistically delineated than the majority of Jonson's humours, and the influence of these humours is to be seen more plainly in the minor characters, Greedy, Marrall, Amble, Furnace, Watchall, Tapwell and Willdo. Deservedly the force of dialogue, the skill in construction, and the power of characterization in this drama have been unstintingly praised by Massinger's critics. Massinger's later comedy, The City Madam (1632 ; printed 1658), has something of the same force. Its didactic purpose it shares with Eastward Ho, the ambitious aims of Lady Frugal being satirized much as are those of Gertrude in the earlier play. The atmosphere of merchant-life is, likewise, in both the same, far enough away from Fletcher's gallant circles. There is little here of the spirit of the 'comedy of manners,' if we are to restrict that phrase to the only comedy to which it really belongs, the comedy of Congreve.¹

Among the other writers in this style of realism, now frankly Jonsonian in inspiration, now moving toward the later style, only a few can be mentioned here, and those few treated in a summary manner. Middleton and Rowley, as we have seen, may be considered together, and it is probably the collaboration of these two which makes so many of the works passing under the former's name appear so disproportioned and unequal. The Excellent Comedy, called The Old Law (1599; printed 1656; probably written by Middleton and revised by Rowley and Massinger) exhibits these in a startling manner. The play as a whole is a poor one, but there are in it portions of true comic spirit and not a few touches of higher poetic power. Much finer is Blurt Master-Constable. Or The Spaniards Night-walke (1601-2; printed 1602) with its racy prose scenes, but even this may be regarded as largely 'prentice-work. After a further experiment in The Phoenix (1603-4; printed 1607), a clear imitation of Jonson's style, Middleton passed on to pen his most brilliant comedy, A Trick to Catch the Old-One (c. 1605; printed 1608). There is nothing new here in the characterization, for the types all belonged to the common tradition of the stage. The humours, therefore, are old—the Luces and Hoards and Lampreys and Moneyloves—but the dialogue is consistently fresh, and the plots are excellently and intriguingly developed. Akin to this play is the truly delightful A Mad World, My Masters (c. 1605; printed 1608), again filled with no new figures, but bustling with vitality and life. All of Middleton's plays have the same features—this sincere joy in existence, this love of easily delineated dramatis personæ, these many lapses from artistic refinement. His plays in their own way are typical of the age. The satiric note is absent here, yet all his dramas deal with vice, often vice of a callous and nauseating sort. Lacking the airy lightness of Fletcher's refinement, he seems more down in the mire of life, and there is a consequent want of delicacy in his work. The Widdow (date unknown; printed 1652), for example, shows a weakened moral tone in spite of the fact that it has been described as "curiously innocent, for a play by Middleton."

¹ See p. 250 ; and cf. also An Introduction to Dramatic Theory, p. 184. The term 'manners' is very loosely used by most writers on the seventeenth century ; examples of this loose use may be found in both Symonds and Schelling.

REALISTIC COMEDY & SATIRICAL PLAYS

Of Rowley's own unaided work, A Merrie and Pleasant Comedy: Never before Printed, called A Shoo-maker a

BRITISH DRAMA

Gentleman (c. 1608; printed 1638) shows in its subject-matter and even in its atmosphere the influence of Dekker. A New Wonder, A Woman never vexed. A pleasant conceited Comedy (date unknown; printed 1632) is probably a revision of an earlier play. Its chief interest is its serious and moral tone. The theme deals mainly with the imprisonment of Stephen, a character conceived in a distinctly sentimental strain. This Stephen, a spendthrift with a good heart, is released by Robert, his nephew, who is promptly disinherited by his over-righteous father, Old Foster. Stephen, on regaining his freedom, marries a rich widow, and Old Foster goes bankrupt. In his distress the father is aided by his son, and at length, like Lear, loses his self-righteous pride in a new sense of humanity. Jonson's influence is clearly to be seen in many of the characters, such as, for example, Innocent Lambskin and Sir Godfrey Speedwell; but Rowley felt too the impress of Shakespeare. The gilliflowers of Jane seem taken from The Winter's Tale, and the Host is a replica of the Host in The Merry Wives of Windsor. The general atmosphere, however, is his own, with its intensely moral and sentimental colouring. A Match at Midnight (date unknown; printed 1633) likewise seems to be a revised play, written originally, according to many critics, by Middleton. It is a mixture of the Jonsonian style moving toward the world of manners, and of intrigue. Bloodhound, a miser, is the chief character; he plans to marry the Widow, who has many suitors, but whose husband is eventually discovered in Jarvis. Bloodhound's daughter, Moll, marries Ancient Young, and Tim is paired off with Sue. The theme is a common one of marriage hunting and marriage deceits, but the number of passages which exist for the sake of their wit alone mark this comedy as moving in the same direction as those of Fletcher.

A comedy more of the intrigue type is given us in Jasper Mayne's The City Match (printed 1639), a fair work spoilt by too many disguises and complications. The only really well-drawn character in it is Aurelia, but the scenes wherein we are shown how Warehouse is cheated by his witty nephew Plotwell are full of good fun. Infinitely less agreeable is Thomas Killigrew's The Parson's Wedding (1640; printed 1664), as foul a production as can be imagined. It would not have been mentioned here save that it forms a fitting illustration of the rapid degeneracy of the times. There is little wit in the dialogue, and the comedy as a whole can make an appeal only to those who place vulgarity in the stead of art. An interesting play of a more satirical tone is the anonymous Lady Alimony, or the Alimony Lady (printed 1659) with its peculiar structure and valuable comments on current conditions. The Antiquary (printed 1641) of Shackerley Marmion has in the midst of its atmosphere of humours something of a romantic touch. The disguising of the Duke reminds us of the adventures of a Haroun al-Raschid; but the characters of Lionel, the Antiquary, Petruchio, and Mocinigo are all conceived after the Jonsonian manner.

164

REALISTIC COMEDY & SATIRICAL PLAYS

Such single comedies of varying characteristics recede in importance when we come to consider the realistic works of that last representative of the Elizabethans, James Shirley. Shirley is not always satiric in his art, but he does follow Jonson in introducing into many of his plays a distinctly contemporary tone. His very first play, The Schoole of Complement (1625; printed 1631), is in this style. A typically youthful production, it has no inherent unity, but passes from theme to theme in a hopelessly inconsequent manner. The main subject, however—the fantastic school where young gallants are taught to pay the most highly flowered compliments—is freshly and entertainingly treated. A more artistic construction is to be seen in The Wittie Faire One (1632; printed 1633), a comedy of considerable excellence, and at the same time full of that intellectual gallantry which at its best rises to wit and at its worst sinks to crass vulgarity. The attitude of the sexes to one another is to be noted in these plays of Shirley and in other dramas of the time. In the Middle Ages the Courts of love had made of woman an ideal, something apart from life; the Renaissance brought with it the conception of masculine and feminine equality. For a time in the Elizabethan period that equality was viewed in the light of emotion and passion ; but as the age moved forward intellect came to take the place of this emotion, and common sense reigned. Nowhere, possibly, is this common-sense and intellectual attitude to be seen more clearly than in Shirley's comedies of social life. "Come," says the gallant Fowler to Penelope in this particular play, "remember you are imperfect creatures without a man ; be not you a goddess ; I know you are mortal, and had rather make you my companion than my idol ; this is no flattery now." The atmosphere of Rosalind and Orlando, of Ferdinand and Miranda, has become a thing of the past. Shirley's comedies of later date all continue in the same strain. Changes : Or Love in a Maze (1632) was deservedly famous in its own time, and is noteworthy for the witty satire presented through the medium of Caperwit. Hide Parke (1632 ; printed 1637) deals again with a contemporary world of wit, and The Lady of Pleasure (1635 ; printed 1637) makes clever use of contemporary social follies. The latter play contains an interesting study of a woman type later to occupy many comedies ; Celestina has many of the features of heroines in the comedy of manners.

BRITISH DRAMA

Among the lesser writers—the works of whom may be noted here without much comment—Nathaniel Field, the actor, and Richard Brome deserve first mention. Field had been a performer in several of Jonson's plays, and it is not surprising to find that humours predominate in A Woman is a Weathercocke (1610 ; printed 1612) and in Amends for Ladies (c. 1611 ; printed 1618). Both show the influence of Shakespeare besides that of Jonson, and, charming as are many of the scenes, it cannot be denied that Field has failed to discover a flux which might fuse together these so opposing elements. His two plays are carelessly constructed and preserve their interest only for separate scenes or passages of dialogue.

Richard Brome is even more Jonsonian in his efforts—a natural outcome of the fact that he had been for some years a servant to the great Ben. Several of his plays remained popular successes well on into the eighteenth century, and it is to be recognized that he had no small talent for the stage. Most important of all, he had a certain inventive power which led him to draw the Jonsonian comedy, as Fletcher did, toward the realm of the comedy of manners, and this in spite of a decidedly coarser style and outlook than that exhibited by his master. Of his nineteen plays two may be mentioned here, The Northern Lasse (printed 1632) and A Joviall Crew : Or, The Merry Beggars (1641; printed 1652). The first was Brome's primal effort and shows him, like Field, engaged in the endeavour to fuse together the satirical strain of Jonson and some elements of romantic fervour. The second has great interest because of its picaresque theme, which is treated with all the coarseness and vitality which such a subject usually demands.

REALISTIC COMEDY & SATIRICAL PLAYS

A brief backward glance at the general contents of this chapter will serve to show that the Jonsonian satiric comedy in its purest form did not find very many direct successors. On the other hand, there were several movements in drama between 1600 and 1642 which often coalesced with his style. There was, first, the fresh comedy of the Dekker type, which dealt in a somewhat sentimental way with the lives of the lower and middle classes. This form of comedy is one of the most delightful that the age produced, but it was destined to be crushed out of existence by the vice and corruption rapidly growing upon the Cavalier element in society. The comedy of intrigue, too, frequently adopted a realistic instead of a romantic tone, and so merged with the Jonsonian type. This comedy of intrigue, however, dealt usually with upper-class characters, and out of it there developed, inspired by the changing tastes and manners of the time, a sort of comedy of manners, not fully dissociated as yet from the rougher forms of earlier drama, but leading forward toward Etherege. Nearly all the realistic comedies are marred by coarseness and vulgarity, thus displaying the evil that was growing in power throughout those years; but in spite of that vulgarity we must recognize that the realism served a good purpose in its day. It helped to keep drama close to real life at a time when many writers were striving by their romantic plots and characters to make of the theatre an artificial and fantastic thing, and its very coarseness aided in preserving a touch of moral sanity as opposed to the decadent emotions and lubricity of the Fords and others who descended to the most disgusting and nauseating of sexual emotions. The satire in the Jonson drama did little good directly in the way of mitigating the abuses of the age, but it proved a most salutary element in the world of the theatre.

BRITISH DRAMA

CHAPTER IV

SHAKESPEARIAN TRAGEDY

FROM the above rapid analysis of comedy and of tragi-comedy in the first half of the seventeenth century a return must be made to the realm of tragedy, where will be found exemplified in varying ways many of the tendencies which have already been noted in the other forms of drama. This period includes the chief works of Shakespeare, and it must be our endeavour to regard those works for their own sakes and for their importance as documents in the consideration of dramatic history.

The series of Shakespearian tragedies (considered apart from the history plays) starts well back in the sixteenth century with the doubtful drama entitled The most Lamentable Romaine Tragedie of Titus Andronicus (1594), and proceeds through the Excellent conceited Tragedie of Romeo and Iuliet (? 1595; printed 1597), The Tragedie of Iulius Cæsar (1599; printed 1623), The Tragicall Historie of Hamlet Prince of Denmarke (? 1601; printed 1603 and 1604), The Historie of Troylus and Cresseida (? 1602; printed 1609, and as a "Tragedie" 1623), The Tragædy of Othello (? 1604; printed 1622), The Tragedie of Macbeth (c. 1606; printed 1623), the True Chronicle Historie of the life and death of King Lear and his three Daughters (1605; printed 1608), The Tragedie of Anthonie, and Cleopatra (c. 1606; printed 1623), and The Tragedy of Coriolanus (c. 1606; printed 1623) to The Lyfe of Tymon of Athens (c. 1607; printed 1623). As is obvious, Titus Andronicus and Romeo and Juliet stand apart by reason of their date and their consequently independent characteristics, while in the greater group we find two classes of plays, the Roman tragedies and the four masterpieces, Hamlet, Othello, Macbeth, and King Lear. It may, for our purpose, be most convenient to discuss these plays in their separate sections.

Titus Andronicus has probably but little to do with Shakespeare ; if it has large parts from his pen the sooner it is forgotten the better. Thoroughly melodramatic, full of the most blood-curdling horrors, it conveys no evidence of a settled idea in the author's mind as to the true nature of tragedy. Its one aim is to shock the audience by the most horrible means possible, and in this it certainly succeeds. Had it not been included in the Shakespeare canon it is unquestionable that all critics of the Elizabethan drama would either have ignored it or styled it one of the most revolting plays of the late sixteenth century. As an historical document, on the other hand, it has its own interest. It shows to us the crude tastes of the spectators of Shakespeare's time, for, in view of the fact that three quartos were issued before the appearance of the First Folio text of 1623, we cannot but believe it to have been a popular drama. Love of crude horror is evidently as marked a feature of the audience of 1595 as love of artistically stressed horror is of the audience of 1635.

Romeo and Juliet, on the other hand, is a true work of dramatic art, even if there are in it many failings due to the inexperience of the writer. Its lyrical passion at times rises to the heights of ecstasy, and the comic matter, both of the more refined sort in Mercutio and of the coarser texture in the Nurse, is excellently managed. This tragedy is obviously a young man's effort and shows the fullness of Renaissance thought and passion. In spite of its lyricism it is of the earth. There is no spiritual message here, no mental struggles, no wearied emotion that almost reaches the levels of mysticism as in Macbeth and in Hamlet. The love of Romeo and Juliet is an earthly passion, and the whole colour of the play is rich with those dazzling hues which we associate with fifteenth-century Italy. These features separate Romeo markedly from the later tragedies ; but there are besides these features of difference of even greater importance. Here Shakespeare has not as yet formulated his true tragic spirit. He is filled with the joy of Renaissance imaginings ; his poetry flows in a clear stream of impassioned eloquence ; but of higher conception there is none. The tragedy of Romeo and Juliet might, after all, have been a comedy. Mercutio did not need to die ; little lies between the two lovers and a happy existence. There is nothing wrong in their actions ; there is nothing wrong in their grasping at this youthful passion. They are merely star-crossed ; fate and even chance thwart their best-considered plans. They are mere puppets in the hands of a power greater and more majestic than themselves. This form of tragedy of fate is the typical type of Greek drama ; but there are æons between the spirit of Ædipus and the spirit of Romeo. The Greek tragedy owed its greatness partly to the awful religious conceptions of the time, to the idea of some power or powers governing human lives and human actions, partly to the fusion of mortal error, the ἀμαρτία of Aristotle, with this fatal power. With Shakespeare fate as such is simply not conceived ; we do not rise from a reading of Romeo and Juliet with the feeling that some tremendous power stands over our petty lives ; we rise with the feeling that some blind chance has obstructed wildly the deeds of these two lovers. There is not the profound majesty of Greek drama leading to emotions that are full of terror and sublimity ; there are only the petty movements of a conscienceless power that leave us rebellious and dissatisfied. Romeo and Juliet is a fine tragedy, but it is such only because of the poetry that breathes in its every scene. It is Shakespeare's greatest tour de force.

SHAKESPEARIAN TRAGEDY

In Hamlet and the other three plays of his highest power this atmosphere is changed for another, in which there is evidence that there had come to him a new conception of tragedy. Here fate may be suggested, but fate causes the downfall of none of these tragic heroes. Their fate, after all, is their own, and remains their own even while we recognize that each is faced with peculiar and for him insurmountable difficulties. There is here, that is to say, the same union of fate and human failing which is to be discovered in Sophocles. An outline, even a brief outline, of the fundamental forces in each of these four plays would occupy much more space than this volume can afford.

These are plays, moreover, with which almost every one is acquainted, and it may be sufficient for our purpose here to indicate briefly some of the ways in which these dramas fall in with the general theatrical tendencies of the time.

Hamlet, as has been hinted before, is an offspring of Kyd's Spanish Tragedy. Whether Kyd himself wrote a tragedy on this theme is uncertain; but we know of the existence of a 'Hamlet' play at least as early as the year 1589. Henslowe's lists inform us that it was revived in 1594. The probability is that this "Ur-Hamlet" was the production of Shakespeare himself and was the foundation of the later Hamlet, reworked about 1601 and later revised about 1602. This tragedy, then, belongs to the series of revenge plays inaugurated by Kyd about 1589. The first Hamlet, as we know from the 1603 quarto, possessed little of the introspective philosophy of the later; in action it was similar to the other, but it lacked almost entirely those higher qualities which have seized upon the imaginations of all ages from the Elizabethan to the present day. These introspective meditations, however, would not seem to have been of Shakespeare's own invention. The play of Hamlet would probably have been almost entirely forgotten had it not been for the production in 1599 of Marston's History of Antonio and Mellida (printed 1602), followed by Antonios Reuenge (printed the same year). Both of these are crude plays, but together they display some peculiar and remarkable characteristics. In the first Antonio appears disguised as an Amazon, revealing himself only to Mellida. His disguise is discovered by Piero, and he only just succeeds in escaping in the habit of a sailor. Mellida flies after him, but is captured; and Piero closes the play by pretending to let his vengeful thoughts die. The second part is full of torment. Piero treacherously poisons Andrugio, murders Feliche, slanders his own daughter, and makes love to Maria. Antonio is faced by the spirit of his father, and plots his revenge. He succeeds first in murdering the little Julio and then gets Piero killed in a masque. The plot is incoherent and difficult to follow; none of the characters are satisfactorily delineated ; but certain features attract our interest. There is, in the first place, the ghost of a murdered father appearing to a son ; there is plenty of feigned madness ; there is a general disgust at life ; there is the weakness of a mother ; there is a play within a play ; and there are, besides, passages which were evidently in Shakespeare's mind in this richest period of his career. It is not too much to say that in Antonio and Mellida we have evidence that the melancholy and apparent disgust at the world of which so much has been made by the more sentimental and imaginative biographers of Shakespeare was nothing more or less than a literary pose probably aroused by the success of Marston's dramas. In Hamlet Shakespeare has taken over the Antonio and Mellida atmosphere, and has made it live ; he has given to the revenge theme a higher purpose ; he has, above all, formulated for tragedy a central and a dominant aim. It is peculiar to note that in this play, which seems so filled with deepest and profoundest expression of tragic thoughts, Shakespeare should have introduced a scene which at once links the drama as a whole to the Poetaster-Satiromastix controversy. The quarrel between the adult players and the children for whom Jonson was at that time writing is inserted, without any thought of historical accuracy, into the midst of Hamlet's meditations—an artistic defect, but one which serves to prove still further the independence of Shakespeare in this world of gloomy thoughts and suicidal imaginings.

SHAKESPEARIAN TRAGEDY

Othello presents an entirely different set of characteristic elements. Here is no gloom, but passion of the most tremendous sort. Shakespeare's central purpose in tragedy is, however, still preserved ; once more the tragedy is a variation on a set theme. Othello is notable for its structure, a structure determined no doubt by the nature of the plot, but at the same time possibly showing the influence of the new theories concerning play construction which at the time were being put forward by Jonson and others of the neo-classical school. Othello has interest, moreover, because of its theme. Hamlet, Macbeth, and King Lear deal with princely characters and scenes; Othello presents to us a Moorish general, a high-born Venetian maiden, and a distinctly low-born ancient. The atmosphere of the tragedy is decidedly not 'royal,' and it may be that here there was being exercised on Shakespeare some influence from the group of domestic tragedies later to be considered.

BRITISH DRAMA

In Macbeth there are many problems. The structure is not nearly so fine as that of Othello, but in the swiftness of its opening and in its gradual close it appears almost a counterpart to the other play. The text is certainly not so good as that of Othello, and it is possible that we have to make allowances for later additions inserted by some unthinking and sacrilegious writer. In Macbeth we find the same cardinal tragic idea, exemplified this time in the figure of a noble but ambitious and weak-willed Scottish general. Unquestionably the theme approved itself to Shakespeare because of the recent ascension to the throne of James VI of the house of Stuart. Topical references designed to flatter the pedantic and superstitious monarch abound in this play. James had written a book on Demonology, and so witches appear. The curing of the 'King's evil' is narrated at a time of emotional stress quite needlessly. A plain allusion to the union of the crowns is introduced into the prophetic visions called into being by the three weird hags. We can hardly imagine that Shakespeare drew in all of these because he thought they would improve his play; yet Macbeth remains one of the greatest tragedies of all time.

With King Lear we note a distinct retrogression, in spite of many deep thoughts and a characterization unequalled in Shakespeare's other works. For some reason the firmly knit structure of Othello is forgotten; and a reversion is made to the old formless technique of the chronicle history. There is little of the concentration of unity visible in the two preceding tragedies, and as a consequence Lear is less of a dramatic masterpiece than those. It possesses epic characteristics ill adapted for stage representation. This, of course, does not take away from the fact that Lear is one of the greatest of all works of genius; as a dramatic poem it has never been surpassed, even if as a drama it has many weaknesses and blemishes. In regard to the subject of this play it may be noted that Shakespeare once more seems to have been following a fashion of the time. In the first years of the seventeenth century scenes of early Britain proved immensely popular, probably because of the fact that patriotic pride was flattered by the thought of ancient Trojan greatness and of British valour. Whatever the cause, King Lear, Cymbeline, Bonduca, and others of the same type proved extremely successful on the stage, the love for such plays enduring to as late a date as 1633, when Jasper Fisher's Fuimus Troes was presented at Oxford.

SHAKESPEARIAN TRAGEDY

Turning to the Roman plays we find no fewer points of relationship with current fashion. The Renascence was partly at least a revival of interest in classical life and literature, so that it was but natural that some attention should be paid to works such as Plutarch's Lives. Romanticists and classicists here met as one, Ben Jonson penning his Sejanus and Catiline, Fletcher his Valentinian, Massinger his Roman Actor, and Shakespeare his Julius Cæsar and Coriolanus.

Julius Cæsar, derived directly from North's rendering of Plutarch with very questionable hints from Appian's Civil Wars, was written on the most popular of all these Roman themes. The figure of Cæsar himself, his association with Britain, and the tragic story of his death all contributed to make this a subject eminently acceptable to English audiences. In this tragedy we can discern Shakespeare just on the borders of his greatest and fullest utterance. There are many finely drawn characters in the play ; there is a certain unity of conception ; but as a whole the drama just fails to rise to the heights of true tragic dignity. There is, in the first place, the lack of a central figure. In one way Cæsar is the hero, yet he does not in person dominate the whole play. In another way Brutus is the hero, yet he has to share his place with the conqueror. Moreover, if Brutus is to be regarded as the main figure on whom the tragic action devolves we find that Shakespeare's conception is not that which is exemplified in his immediately following plays. Brutus is not faced with a difficulty he cannot master. He is placed in a dilemma and acts in the only way possible for him. This difference in idea takes away from the emotion of tremendous awe which is visible in the other tragedies. We realize that

BRITISH DRAMA

This was the Noblest Roman of them all :
All the Conspirators saue onely hee,
Did that they did, in enuy of great Cæsar :
He, onely in a generall honest thought,
And common good to all, made one of them, but we cannot summon up in ourselves the true tragic passion in witnessing his fall. The same dissatisfaction is left in our minds as when we witness Romeo and Juliet. At the same time, we may see Shakespeare moving in this play toward his final conception of tragedy. He interweaves into the force of character the force of supernatural powers. Cæsar and Brutus meet their deaths through their own actions and through the actions of other men ; yet there is continually hinted in the play that somehow the happenings of this earth are related to unseen and tremendous presences. The warning given to Cæsar, the apparitions in the streets of Rome, all add to this feeling. Shakespeare has moved from the realm of direct and somewhat crude enunciation to that of artistic and subtle suggestion.

Leaving Troilus and Cressida for the moment we come next to Antony and Cleopatra, written after the series of Hamlet, Othello, Macbeth, and King Lear, and forming as it were a sequel to the first Roman play. In structure Antony and Cleopatra belongs to the type of King Lear. It is formed on the plan of the chronicle history, and, fine as the drama is, one is tempted to believe that had it been written alongside of Othello it would have taken on an added dignity and majesty of conception. This, it is to be noted, is the only one tragedy of Shakespeare's maturity which deals with the theme of love. Love in general is fatal to the true tragic atmosphere, as may be seen in the pitiful plays of the early eighteenth century ; and Shakespeare, consciously or unconsciously, has sought to make harder the impression of the play as a whole by emphasizing the essential nobility of the hero and heroine at the close. The tragedy lies in Cleopatra's ill-use of that charm which even her critics could not but realize would never be withered by age or staled by custom. Nor would it have been to Shakespeare's purpose to have made her merely a fascinating syren; in the last scene when, Antony lost, she applies the asp to her arm Shakespeare has retained almost unaltered the original words of Plutarch, from whose general conception of Cleopatra's character he had in the main consistently differed. So, too, Antony's greatness is revealed to us even in the moments of his vacillation.

176

SHAKESPEARIAN TRAGEDY

Come,

Let's haue one other gawdy night !

he cries before the final battle which is to undo him ; yet a moment before he had shown himself a very Macbeth in his true martial enthusiasm :

I will be trebble-sinewed, hearted breath'd.

Antony and Cleopatra will assuredly remain one of the most tremendous of all love tragedies ; yet even Shakespeare could not raise the type to the height of his other master-pieces. It is beautiful ; but it has not the rich gloom and august colouring of his other works.

If Antony and Cleopatra is somewhat too rich in some of its scenes, Coriolanus is at times rather austere. The structure of the play is by no means neo-classical, yet the general atmosphere is nearer to Sejanus than to Julius Cæsar. Once more Shakespeare turned to deal with a theme of pride, even as he had done in King Lear, for it is obviously the pride, the love of reputation, and the contempt of popular opinion of Coriolanus which brings about his downfall. He is thoroughly disgusted at anything which savours of outward flattery, as when he declares that he Had rather haue one scratch my Head i' th' Sun,

When the Alarum were strucke, then idly sit
To heare my Nothings monster'd, and yet he delights unconsciously in the esteem in which he is, and in which he feels he ought to be, held. In this he differs from the praise-loving Lear, but he shares Lear's lack of subtlety, as when he sweeps aside the moderate counsel of Menenius, or as when he pours out the torrent of his wrath on the senators of Corioli :

BRITISH DRAMA

Boy, false Hound :

If you haue writ your Annales true, 'tis there,
That like an Eagle in a Doue-co[a]t, I Flutter'd your Volcians in Corioles.
Alone I did it, Boy.

Coriolanus is the last of this great group of tragedies. Timon, which followed, is manifestly an incoherent production and almost certainly was tampered with by some one after Shakespeare had written it. As it stands, it in no wise deserves to be considered along with the rest. We are left, therefore, with the strange Troilus and Cressida. The story is a medieval one, but Shakespeare, like Chaucer, no doubt received it as equally authentic with Homer's Iliad. This theme has something of the same appeal as those of early British heroes. The love of Trojan valour goes along with the desire to trace in the English race relics of the burning Ilium. In this play are mingled lyricism, coarseness, satire, and a seeming pessimism ; but the combination cannot be used to illustrate Shakespeare's mood at the time of writing it. To present the Greeks as cowards tallies with the adulation of the Trojans ; to adopt a darkened attitude toward life and love merely follows a current fashion for melancholy. At the same time, the play as it stands is a peculiar one, and possibly Sir Walter Raleigh's supposition that certain portions of it were written about the time when Romeo and Juliet was being penned will come to be accepted as the true explanation of the incoherencies and inconsistencies of the work. By this theory the juxtaposition of fine lyrical passion and of utter vulgarity might satisfactorily be accounted for. Troilus is an interesting but not a great play. It is full of the most penetrating thought, yet as a whole it fails to secure that true unity of impression necessary in all great drama whether romantic or classic.

SHAKESPEARIAN TRAGEDY

Shakespeare's endeavour in tragedy has thus been seen to be broad and variegated, but from an analysis of his chief plays we can perhaps indicate in a summary form some of the main elements in his conception of tragic drama. (1) Tragedy for him is not a thing of love. His finest plays put love far into the background. (2) It is built up on a union of character and fate. The tragic hero has the fatal ἀμαρτία, yet is placed in such circumstances that his ruin is assured. (3) Violent and vivid action on the stage move alongside of mental conflict. Hamlet and Macbeth are melodramas if we consider their plots alone, but derive their greatness from the union of thought and emotion with action. (4) The tragic hero is placed in a position such as no other character in the tragedy holds. He becomes not a superman, as with Marlowe's heroes, but a figure standing high above his companions.

No one was to follow Shakespeare in this line of tragic development. No one succeeded in catching the true spirit of his drama, although many of his immediate followers borrowed hints from him, and revealed in phrase and scene and character the influence of his example.

CHAPTER V

THE REVENGE PLAY

THE type of drama of which Hamlet is an example proved so popular all through the early seventeenth century that a separate chapter is required for a consideration of the form. We have already glanced at three specimens of this class, The Spanish Tragedy, Antonio and Mellida, and Hamlet; perhaps Alphonsus and The Jew of Malta might be included as a fourth and a fifth. Before the end of the sixteenth century many dramas of this species must have been in existence, but the majority of these have irretrievably perished. The popularity of the revenge play is probably due to two forces, usually antagonistic to one another—the romantic love of incident and the neo-classic desire to follow Greek and Latin models. The one found satisfaction in witnessing the duplicities and scenes of horror which inevitably are associated with this type of drama; the other was delighted to see some following of Sophoclean and Senecan models. In mentioning Sophocles it must, of course, be remembered that in Elizabethan times knowledge of the Greek dramatists was extremely limited. Occasionally one can trace what appear to be reminiscences of scenes in Athenian plays, but for the most part the Greek influence was exerted at second-hand. Seneca, after all, was for the Elizabethans the classic dramatist par excellence, and from him they took their revenge themes, their ghosts, and their horrors. Orestes and Atreus became the models for all the Hieronimos and the Hamlets of the age. This delight in the revenge themes may have another cause. The Elizabethans, subconsciously, were eager to witness the revelation of peculiar states of mind, and those peculiar states of mind could nowhere better be shown than in plays of this type. They had a strange love of melancholy, and melancholy is often associated with the desire for revenge. In all ways, therefore, the revenge form was bound to prove popular, and exercised its fascination on men of such diverse genius as Kyd, Marston, Shakespeare, Webster, and Tourneur.

180

THE REVENGE PLAY

Among the earlier dramas built on this theme Henry Chettle's The Tragedy of Hoffman or A Revenge for a Father (c. 1602; printed 1631) is one of the most interesting, if not one of the best written, with its bloody-minded hero who fails in his full purpose only through his fatal flaw in loving a woman who in the end causes his ruin. Chapman is another who gave variety to the type in his tragedy called The Revenge of Bussy D'Ambois (c. 1610; printed 1613), the sequel to Bussy D'Ambois (1604; printed 1607). Although not connected with this in the adoption of a revenge story, Chapman's other tragedies may here be mentioned—The Conspiracie, and Tragedie of Charles Duke of Byron (1608) and The Tragedie of Chabot Admirall of France (c. 1613; printed 1639). The remarkable points about these four plays are the choice of themes from almost contemporary French history and the peculiar presentation of character. The first is a fine poetic tragedy, lacking only in a general unity of impression. The characterization of Bussy himself is well carried out, although his liaison with Tamyra, the wife of Montsurry, hardly entitles him to favour in modern eyes. His death seems not the result of a human failing, but well merited because of his own actions. In the sequel Baligny and Clermont D'Ambois are displayed as revenge heroes plotting the ruin of those who had dispatched the latter's brother. The plot moves forward in a series of hesitating steps. Clermont is arrested, but released again. He succeeds in murdering Montsurry, and finally commits suicide after securing the death of the Guise. The Umbra Bussy is presented on the stage in time-honoured manner, but its crudeness, when contrasted with the subtlety of Shakespeare's method, rather spoils the general tone of the play. The Byron drama is noteworthy mainly for its delineation of the hero's character, particularly in his last scenes, and might in this respect be compared with Chabot. In the latter Chapman deals as in Bussy D'Ambois with Court rivalry and the opposing forces of evil and honesty. Chabot is tried, and his enemies, with their corrupt practices, are exposed, but he dies of a broken heart because of the suspicion of his King. The theme has interest in the presentation of a low-born favourite who, instead of engaging in corrupt intrigues and self-aggrandisement, is the very mirror of uprightness and honesty. The play fails, however, because of the very goodness of the hero. All of Chapman's dramas have this central deficiency. Tragedy for him is merely a tale of opposing forces, ending in death; it is not the record of a mental conflict or the ruin consequent on some human failing. He has none of Shakespeare's subtlety, none of Shakespeare's high conception of drama.

BRITISH DRAMA

With many variations the revenge theme was taken up by other dramatists. It appears, for example, in a slightly disguised and novel form in Beaumont and Fletcher's The Maidens Tragedy (c. 1611; printed 1619), a play obviously reminiscent of Shakespeare, but showing the decaying fabric of the age. The plot is a simple one. Amintor is married by the King's command to Evadne. He discovers that in reality she is the unashamed mistress of his monarch. Thoughts of revenge surge in upon him, only to be stifled at the thought of that divinity which hedges in a king. Evadne, however, is herself wrought into repentance, and in her horror she murders her lover, only to realize that her crime repels her friends from her. The interest in peculiar marital and sexual relationships is here; there are the stock characters of the later drama; there is the rich poetry surrounding objectionable themes. We cannot but confess that this is a finely written play; but at the same time we cannot admit that it is a great tragedy. Its atmosphere, in spite of the intensity of the passions, is close to that of the romantic tragi-comedy. Several other of the Beaumont and Fletcher series may also be considered here. The weakness that lies in the direct introduction of the supernatural and the close association between the worlds of romance and of tragedy in these years is plainly exemplified in Cupid's Revenge (? 1612; printed 1615), a play of tragic import, but wanting entirely in the true spirit of tragedy proper. Here a Duke's daughter denies the power of Cupid. The god, resenting this slight, comes to the earth and causes her to fall in love with a dwarf and eventually die of grief. The action is further complicated by the fact that Cupid, not content with this vengeance, makes the son love Bacha, a prostitute, and concludes by causing the Duke to marry her. The intrigues of this woman lead to a universal catastrophe. The Bloody Brother, or Rollo Duke of Normandy (date uncertain; printed 1639; ascribed to Massinger, Fletcher, Jonson, and Field) likewise deals in part with a theme of revenge, and, in spite of an incoherence in structure due partly to the collaboration of various authors, deserves remembrance for the character of Edith. In The Tragedy of Thierry King of France, and his Brother Theodoret (date unknown; printed 1621; attributed to Fletcher and Massinger) there is again something of the revenge motive, allied to elements of decadence and horror. Brunhalt is a monster of vice and is angered by Theodoret's upbraidings. She flies to his brother Thierry, and at his Court peace is apparently made between the mother and the son. A marriage is arranged between Thierry and Ordella, and the mother gives him a disgusting drug, which she follows up with a murderous blow to one of her sons and a fatal dose of poison to the other. Many scenes in this play remind us forcibly of Shakespeare, particularly that last passage when Ordella, who, like Hero and Hermione, has been preserved by a friend when all believed her dead, awakens to utter a last few words to the expiring Thierry. The broken, short sentences, the phrases "Oh happy, happy soul . . . Can spirits weep too? . . . The same still, still your servant," recall at once the Lear-Cordelia scenes of earlier date. How far Fletcher had descended, however, is amply evident in this weakly constructed play. The delineation of character is little more than amateurish, Brunhalt being an impossible monster and Theodoret merely vapid. The murder of the latter in Act III is unpremeditated and wholly unexpected, and his last words are simply foolish. The tragedy is nothing but a miserable pièce de théâtre. Revenge motives allied to Machiavellian intrigues appear in The Knight of Malta (c. 1618; printed 1647; attributed to Fletcher, Massinger, and another), a play of the tragi-comic cast. The characters here are again mere stock types; there is the struggle between love and honour; there is the juxtaposition of exaggerated goodness and sensuality. The plot devolves from the tempting of Oriana by Mountferrat. On her refusal he publishes a slander against her and is challenged by her lover Gomera. Oriana and Gomera marry, but the latter's mind is poisoned by the treachery of Zanthia. The play being a tragi-comedy, reconciliation of a somewhat unnatural kind closes the action.

182

THE REVENGE PLAY

BRITISH DRAMA

The revenge play in even more startling forms continued long to exercise its popularity in the hands of Webster, Tourneur, and others. John Webster is to be regarded as one of the most inspired playwrights of this period, although his tragedies all lack force and concentration of purpose. After an early career of work in collaboration with others, he engaged as an independent playwright in Appius and Virginia (c. 1608; printed 1654), an unimportant piece, The White Devil; Or, The Tragedy of Paulo Giordano Ursini, Duke of Brachiano, With the Life and Death of Vittoria Corombona the famous Venetian Curtizan (c. 1610; printed 1612), and The Tragedy of the Dutchesse of Malfy (c. 1614; printed 1623). Both of the latter belong to the horror-play tradition, but the second at least is based on the theme of revenge, and both may be treated together here. The theme of the first is that of a woman of more than ordinary power who desires to gain for herself a wider and larger life. She is married, but, finding this larger life in her love for the Duke, she passes to crime. She aims at the death of her own husband and of the Duchess. Her character is well drawn, and Webster has ample opportunity for displaying his power over the darker side of poetry. The atmosphere of the play is dank and clammy, dark with a kind of cypress gloom, lit only at moments by lurid flashes of light. The woman figure in the second play is no monster. She, a duchess, marries

184

DESIGN BY INIGO JONES FOR HABINGTON'S "THE QUEENE OF ARRAGON"

184

Copyright of His Grace the Duke of Devonshire
Photograph by the Victoria and Albert Museum

THE REVENGE PLAY

for love a steward named Antonio, and her brothers, full of aristocratic horror at the alliance, do all they can to break her spirit. She is immured, placed among madmen, and finally slain along with her children by Bosola. There is here some approach toward true tragic expression, although the subsidiary trappings of a melodramatic sort bring even the finest scenes of the play down from the levels of highest drama. Whatever defects we find in Webster's works, however, it cannot be denied that he is one of the few dramatists of the time who had an insight into the human heart, who was able to delineate individuals and not merely to sketch in rude types.

With Webster is usually associated Cyril Tourneur, whose The Revenger's Tragædie (1607) and The Atheist's Tragedie: Or The honest Man's Revenge (c. 1608; printed 1611) bring us back to the more direct line of revenge dramas. The first, which was published anonymously and has been ascribed by some critics to Webster, is a true tragedy of the revenge-horror style. In the very first scene Vindice enters, characteristically, bearing in his hands the skull of his mistress, his "studies ornament," which he addresses as

Thou shell of Death,
Once the bright face of my betrothed Lady,
When life and beauty naturally fild out
These ragged imperfections.

As a play the tragedy is a good one, developing well the vengeance planned by this character, but once more the melodramatic trappings serve to take away much of the finer spirit of the drama. Thus, for example, Vindice dresses his skull in the garment of a lady, places it in a darkened room, smears the face with deadly poison, and entices in the amorous Duke. The scene has power in it, but power of a decadent sort :

Duke. Piato, well done[.] hast brought her [?] What Lady ist ?

Vind. Faith my Lord a Country Lady, a little bashfull at first as most of them are ; but after the first kisse my Lord the worst is past with them. your grace knowes now what you haue to doo ; sha's some-what a graue looke with her—but——

BRITISH DRAMA

Duke. I loue that best, conduct her.

Vind. Haue at all.

Duke. In grauest lookes the Greatest faultes seeme lesse.
Giue me that sin thats rob'd in Holines.

Vind. Back with the Torch ; brother raise the perfumes.

Duke. How sweete can a Duke breath ? age has no fault,
Pleasure should meete in a perfumed mist, Lady sweetely encountred, I came from Court I must bee bould with you oh, what's this, oh !

Vind. royall villaine, white diuill : Duke. Oh.

Vind. Brother—place the Torch here, that his affrighted eye balls

May start into those hollowes, Duke ; dost knowe
Yon dreadfull vizard, view it well, tis the skull
Of Gloriana, whom thou poysonedst last.

Duke. Oh, tas poysoned me.

Vind. Didst not know that till now ?

Duke. What are you two ?

Vind. Villaines all three ! . . . the very ragged bone,
Has beine sufficiently reuengd.

Duke. Oh Hippolito ? call treason

Hip. Yes my good Lord, treason, treason, treason.

[stamping on him.]

Duke. Then I'me betrayde.

Vind. Alasse poor Lecher in the hands of knaues,
A slauish Duke is baser then his slaues.

Duke. My teeth are eaten out. Vind. Hadst any left.

Hip. I think but few.

Vind. Then those that did eate are eaten. Duke. O my tongue.

Vind. Your tongue ? twill teach you to kisse closer,
Not like a Flobbering Dutchman, you haue eyes still :
Looke monster, what a Lady hast thou made me,
My once betrothed wife.

Duke. Is it thou villaine, nay then . . .

Vind. T'is I, 'tis Vindici, tis I.

In The Atheist's Tragedy we find a similar atmosphere, dark poetry of a lurid kind coexisting with the crudest of horrors. The theme, however, is treated in a novel way, for, though the ghost of his murdered father returns to Charlemont, it is to bid him abstain from vengeance. In the end occurs an unrefined but interesting scene in which D'Ambville, the atheist, repents and confesses his sins.

The revenge play, as we have seen, became confused with the horror drama, and possibly the two can hardly be dealt with separately, but for the purpose of tracing the main tendencies in seventeenth-century dramatic art it may be well to make some quite indeterminate division between the two types, while bearing in mind the fact that many revenge plays exist mainly for the sake of their tormenting scenes and many purely horror dramas include some strains of revenge motive.

THE REVENGE PLAY

CHAPTER VI

THE HORROR TRAGEDY

THE title of this chapter may to some appear a trifle arbitrary, and it is to be confessed that not all the plays here treated display the same characteristics ; indeed, one may go farther and declare that not even all of them deal fundamentally with torment and horror. At the same time, this title seems best to indicate briefly the main tendencies operating upon the minds of many dramatists of the period and to delineate a general movement toward a weaker form of drama. The chief point in common among all the plays is the presence of a somewhat decadent mood and introduction of physical torture in and for itself. In King Lear, for example, the blinding of Gloucester can be dramatically justified ; in most of these horror plays the scenes of torment do not further in any way the development of the plot. Moreover, in nearly all of these tragedies there is no attempt to secure a dominant tone ; pathos is employed frequently, and there are the attempts at novelty in the delineation of the Courts of Roman emperors, as in Fletcher's The Tragedie of Valentinian (c. 1614 ; printed 1647), or those of Italian dukes, as in the plays of Massinger, or those of more romantic potentates, as in Beaumont and Fletcher's Philaster (c. 1610 ; printed 1620). Of true tragic expression in them there is, however, but little.

Massinger's four plays, The Duke of Millaine (printed 1623), The Unnaturall Combat (before 1623 ; printed 1639), The Roman Actor (1626 ; acted 1629), and The Virgin Martir (1620 ; printed 1622 ; written in collaboration with Dekker), may be regarded as some of the best dramas of a type between the Shakespearian and the decadent horror schools. The first contains a truly terrible villain in Francisco—one who can cry :

THE HORROR TRAGEDY

Then we Raigne alone,
For with this Arme I'll swim through Seas of blood,
Or make a Bridge, arch'd with the bones of Men,
But I will graspe my aymes in you my deerest, Deerest, and best of Women——

a threat which in the play he puts into execution ; it contains, too, a scene of novel horror in the last act, when Francisco daubs the cheeks and lips of the dead Marcelia with poison and so contrives the death of Sforza. There are some touches of psychological insight in the play, but Massinger, as critics have often pointed out, does not really know men and women. His evil and his good alike leave us cold, so that Marcelia and Francisco, Eugenia and Sforza, remain more or less lifeless puppets. No less of horror is introduced into The Unnatural Combat, a play which adds to the horrible murder of a son by his father the still more horrible theme of incest. The play is one long series of torments suddenly cast into profoundest gloom after that last flash of lightning which destroys the unfortunate Malefort. In The Roman Actor the scene is changed to Rome of the days of Domitianus Cæsar, with a hero in the actor Paris. Without the employment of horror of the kind introduced into the last-mentioned play Massinger succeeds in conjuring up an atmosphere of equal darkness, of corruption, and of disgust. Spectacular effects are freely employed, as in the last act, when there is heard followed by "Thunder and lightning." The best scenes in the play are those in which Massinger's gift for rhetoric is allowed freest play, those when Paris pleads for his profession ; but as a whole the tragedy does not rouse in us the deepest emotions.

A dreadfull Musicke sounding, Enter Junius Rusticius, and Paphurius Sura, With bloudie swords, they wave them over his head. Cæsar in his sleepe troubled, seemes to pray to the Image, they scornefully take it away . . .

The Virgin Martyr is at once a more interesting and a more peculiar play. It abounds in torture and death, but the character of Dorothea is well drawn, and the 'Christian' sentiment removes the tragedy partly from the regular line of dramatic development. In its setting of Roman decadence, however, in its scenes of torment intermixed with the humours of Hircius and Spungius, in its employment of supernatural forces (Harpax, an evil spirit, follows Theophilus disguised as a secretary), it belongs to the same tradition.

BRITISH DRAMA

Among the plays of Middleton The Changeling (1632 ; printed 1653 ; written in collaboration with Rowley) stands out for its villain De Flores, one who has an individuality of his own and is not merely a stock type. The story unfolds itself admirably. In order to marry Alsemero, Beatrice-Joanna commissions De Flores to murder Alonzo Piracquo. The murder is executed, but De Flores demands his reward. Beatrice shrinks from him :

Why 'tis impossible thou canst be so wicked,
she cries,

Or shelter such a cunning cruelty,
To make his death the murderer of my honor.
Thy language is so bold and vitious,
I cannot see which way I can forgive it with any modesty.

His reply is cynical and adamant :

Push, you forget your selfe, a woman dipt in blood, and talk of modesty.

Bea. O misery of sin ! would I had been bound Perpetually unto my living hate
In that Piracquo, then to hear these words.
Think but upon the distance that Creation
Set 'twixt thy blood and mine, and keep thee there.

Def. Look but into your conscience, read me there,
'Tis a true Book, you'll find me there your equall.

Something of the grandeur of Shakespeare's art enters into this work. Before the indulgence in her fatal error Beatrice feels a premonition of evil. Looking on De Flores, she realizes subconsciously to what he will bring her :

I never see this fellow, but I think
Of some harm towards me, danger's in my mind still,
I scarce leave trembling of an hour after.
The next good mood I find my father in,
I'll get him quite discarded.

THE HORROR TRAGEDY

Peculiarly enough, too, there appear in this play dramatic touches such as Shakespeare knew how to use. In the scene where De Flores murders Alonzo we get, for example, that passionate repetition of a phrase which is so marked in Macbeth and in Antony and Cleopatra :

Alon. I am upon't.

Def. And so am I.

Alon. Deflores, oh Deflores, whose malice hast thou put on ?

Def. Doe you question a work of secresie ? I must silence you.

Alon. Oh, oh, oh.

Def. I must silence you.

In many ways The Changeling is one of the profoundest tragedies outside of the Shakespearian canon. Evil dominates it ; but it is evil that breeds evil and consumes itself in its own villainy at the end. In Women Beware Women (1612 ; printed 1657) Middleton again essayed a study in this kind. Beyond the figure of the Cardinal there is hardly an honest character in the whole drama. The Duke of Florence, who falls in love with Bianca, the sensual wife of the poor Leantio, is a mere voluptuary. Bianca herself is absolutely unprincipled. Leantio is selfish enough to keep both his wife and his mother in want, while later in the play he succumbs to the allurements of Livia. A characteristically fine touch in the tragedy is that whereby the Cardinal, in all honesty reproaching the Duke for his association with Bianca, merely brings thoughts of murder into his brother's head. It is not too much to say, viewing these plays, that, dark as Middleton's atmosphere is, he comes as near to Shakespeare in tragic conception as do any of his contemporaries or followers.

Of the horror school proper, however, from which we have deviated slightly in this consideration of Middleton, Ford and Shirley remain the chief and culminating figures. In the former's four tragedies, The Lovers Melancholy (1628 ; printed 1629), The Broken Heart (c. 1629 ; printed 1633), Loues Sacrifice (c. 1630 ; printed 1633), and Tis Pitty Shees a Whore (c. 1624 ; printed 1633), we are thoroughly immersed in the world of romantic decadence. Ford has a feverish imagination ; he may be a Shelley, as some critics have affirmed, but a Shelley without the idealism. His love of dismal incident and nauseous sexual relationships mark him out as a product of an age of degeneracy. His first play is a tragi-comedy, cast in a rich romantic world (Famagosta in Cyprus) and replete with impossible and fantastic adventure. The interest in melancholy broodings and the general atmosphere of the piece relate this play more intimately to his tragedies than to the rest of his work in the tragi-comic strain. The piece is long-drawn out and frankly artificial, while the scenes where Thamasta falls in love with Eroclea disguised as a page make none too pleasant reading. This interest in strained states of mind is revealed by Ford in all his plays. The Broken Heart deals likewise with a couple of lovers, Orgilus and Penthea, divided from one another by Ithocles, who has made the latter marry the foolish Bassanes. Penthea determines not to be false to the husband she loathes, but pines away and finally dies. Meanwhile Orgilus plans his revenge, which takes a novel form calculated to appeal to the spectacle-loving audience of his time. Ithocles is caught in a cunningly designed chair, where he is murdered, and Orgilus, confessing his guilt, is sent to death. It is not to be denied that the play contains some powerfully affecting situations, as when Calantha learns of the deaths of her lover, her friend, and her father, but as a whole it is fetid and fantastic. Its unreality is only intensified by the whimsical catalogue of interpretations which Ford saw fit to append to his romantically named characters. Ithocles is the Honour of Loveliness, Orgilus is the Angry One, Calantha is the Flower of Beauty, Penthea is Complaint—so the list continues for the whole series of dramatis personæ. Revenge of a different sort is infused into the theme of Love's Sacrifice, a triangle drama involving Bianca, her husband Phillipppo Caraffa, the Duke of Pavy, or Pavia, and Fernando, the Duke's favourite. The story is told with full panoply of spectacular incident, as when a "Tomb is opened" and Fernando steps forth in "his winding sheet." A masque is employed, as in The Spanish Tragedy, to accomplish the revenge plot. All the paraphernalia of external horror and inner frenzy of spirit are wrought into one impassioned, but half madly impassioned, tragedy. 'Tis Pity is possibly Ford's greatest, as it is his most disagreeable, play. The love of the brother and sister, Giovanni and Annabella, is not treated in any high poetic spirit. It is frankly sensual, and Ford seems to take a maddened delight in depicting it. Nor is the sensuality clothed in rich poetry as is the love of Romeo and Juliet; it is unashamed for all the wealth of rich words used. The terrible scene in which the two lovers fall on their knees in a frenzy of amorous passion has something of lunacy in it, and decadent thought is all that can explain the even more terrible scene at the opening of the second act, in which Giovanni, with all the callousness of a degenerate age, informs Annabella that she must marry. Possibly audiences of the time found sympathy for the guilty pair; if they did and pitied Annabella they could do so only out of their own diseased imaginations. The wheel in Ford has come full circle. The manly temper of that age which saw the battered ships of the Armada scudding helplessly northward, that age which produced Shakespeare and Spenser, has given way to a period of effeminacy, of degenerate thought, of maddened sensuality. From the dramatic point of view, also, Ford's dramas reveal the weakened spirit of his age. The novelties in the torments introduced upon the stage have no dramatic purpose; they are there merely to arouse feelings of curiosity and thrill in the hearts of a jaded public. So, too, in his treatment of minor characters. The weak-witted Bergetto in 'Tis Pity meets his death by a stab in the back, and somehow his murder sends an emotion of dissatisfaction through us; the murder is not dramatically justified as, for example, was the murder of Polonius in Hamlet. The audience and the dramatists alike had forgotten what was necessary in a masterpiece of theatrical art.

BRITISH DRAMA

THE HORROR TRAGEDY

Shirley's plays are less full of lunatic frenzies than Ford's, but they too show the decadence of the time. Six tragedies of his have come down to us, The Maidens Revenge (1626; printed 1639), The Traytor (1631; printed 1635), Loves

BRITISH DRAMA

Crueltie (1631; printed 1640), The Dukes Mistris (1636; printed 1638), The Polititian (? 1639; printed 1655), and The Cardinall (1641; printed 1653 in a set of Six New Playes, with separate title-page dated 1652). Only two of these, The Traitor and The Cardinal, are familiarly known to-day. The first of these two is set in a Court of Italy, the second in a Court of France. The Traitor is a story of wild and criminal ambition centring round Lorenzo (the historical Lorenzino de' Medici), who is represented as a villain engaging both the Duke Alexander and Schiarra in his intrigues. The play ends with a wild "heap of tragedies," to use the words of one of the few surviving characters—Schiarra, Amidea, Lorenzo, the Duke, and Petruchio all lying dead upon the stage. The finest scene possibly is that in which the dying Schiarra argues with his sister Amidea and in the end stabs her with his dagger. It cannot be said that this is not a skilfully constructed play; but there remains, as with all of these dramas, a sense of dissatisfaction. It is like "a tale told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, signifying—nothing." The Cardinal is likewise a story of murder and inhuman cruelty. The title-figure is a villain of inhuman proportions, full of lust and bloodthirstiness. His words are calm and cynical, but in their very calmness unnatural:

'Tis in my brain already, and it formes
 Apace, good, excellent revenge, and pleasant !
 She's now within my talons, 'tis too cheap
 A satisfaction for Columbo's death,
 Only to kill her by soft charm or force,
 I'll rifle first her darling chastity,
 'Twil be after time enough to poyson her,
 And she to th' world be thought her own destroyer.
 As I will frame the circumstance, this night
 All may be finished ; for the Colonel,
 Her agent in my Nephewes death (whom I Disturb'd at Counsell with her) I may reach him
 Hereafter, and be Master of his fate.
We starve our Conscience when we thrive in State.

All the characters seem to have become accustomed to a world of extraordinary crime, and poison is as natural to them as eating or sleep. Thus we listen to the words of the Duchess :

THE HORROR TRAGEDY

And yet
He says he loves me dearly, and has promis'd
To make me well again, but I'm afraid,
One time or other he will give me poyson.

The very ordinariness of the phrasing arouses in our minds a sense of distrust and of disbelief. None of Shirley's other tragedies rise to the height of these, pitifully as these are below the tragedies of Shakespeare. Stock types are all that appear in the melodramatic Portuguese story of The Maid's Revenge. In Love's Cruelty, on the other hand, we reach something which is more than a mere play of lubricity. The tragic dénouement follows logically on the fatal weakness of Clarissa, and the characters, while not being presented with any highly individualized traits, are sufficiently interesting to make this tragedy of woman's curiosity almost unique among the later dramas. This play shows that it is not precisely the dealing with sin that makes the tragedies of Ford and the others weak and even disgusting, but the real lack of a true conception of tragic passion and purpose.

It is perhaps unnecessary to detail many of the other tragedies which follow in this line of development, but one or two of the later plays may be briefly indicated for their bearing upon the dramatic tendencies of the time. The Fatal Contract (date uncertain; printed 1653) of William Heminge, the son, it is said, of Shakespeare's fellow-actor, has an interest in its choice of theme and in its treatment of villainy, but hardly rises to any great levels of art. Sir John Suckling's Aglaura (printed 1638) and Brennoralt (printed 1646) must occupy a few lines of comment because of their popularity, partly, it is to be suspected, derived from the esteem in which their author was held as a literary man. The first is a rather poor romantic production in which a universal massacre befalls the characters in the fifth act. True to the spirit of the age, however, Suckling wrote an alternative conclusion to his play, in which, by the use of some ingenuity and at the cost of a good deal of verisimilitude, these same characters are preserved alive and happy. An equally mythical Poland is the setting for the largely political tragi-comedy of Brennoralt, in which Suckling shows a considerably greater power over play construction and management of character.

BRITISH DRAMA

Horror of a primitive kind appears in A Tragedy called All's Lost by Lust (c. 1616-9; printed 1633) by William Rowley. The theme is improbable, but some of the scenes are powerfully managed. The alliance of the father of the deflowered Jacinta with Mully Mumen is well wrought out, although the inhuman treachery of the Moor leaves us, in Jonson's words, "somewhat costive of belief." Nor do the horrors end with the Moor-Jacinta plot. The low-born Margaretta murders Lazaretto by mistake and finally commits suicide, while her bigamous husband Antonio is fatally wounded. Finally as some of the scenes are planned, the lack of a central purpose in the play destroys its general effect.

For the sake of the author, Sir William D'Avenant's two plays, The Tragedy of Albovine, King of the Lombards (written 1626; printed 1629) and The Cruell Brother (1627; printed 1630), may conclude this survey. Both are gloomy and murderous dramas, where lust, ambition, rapine, and violence fill out gruesome stories. In these tragedies D'Avenant shows himself the follower of Fletcher, Ford, Webster, and Shirley, steeping himself in the atmosphere of lust and criminality before he rose with others to the heights of artificial love and honour.

Several other plays there are, such as the anonymous Second Maidens Tragedy (1611; extant in manuscript and printed in the Malone Society publications) and Nero (1623; printed 1624), which display features calling for attention; but these features are all confined to individual scenes or characters. Even the best of these plays are marred by serious blemishes, and nearly all show the same series of thrilling or revolting situations, of unnatural climaxes and catastrophes, and of stock characterization. Here the romantic drama has run hopelessly to seed.

CHAPTER VII

THE DOMESTIC DRAMA

REACTION to the mood of artificial tragi-comedy and of equally artificial blood-and-thunder tragedy may be found in the school of realistic dramatists who strove to express their ideals now in the realm of the comic theatre, now in more serious dramas. It has been already pointed out, in the brief notice of Arden of Feversham, that realism of this sort was an inevitable outcome of the romantic theatre. Just as the Romantic Revival of the early nineteenth century led toward the excessive simplicity and naturalism of Wordsworth, so in the early seventeenth century the bizarre and florid features of the Fordian and Shirleian tragedies exist alongside of the crude simplicity of the realistic plays ; and both are to be regarded as normal developments of the one, only half-conscious, theory of artistic expression. Both are opposed to the chill, the calm, and the unnatural dignity of the neo-classic stage.

In the field of domestic drama the early seventeenth century is not great ; it produced no single masterpiece which might serve as a model for future writers. At the same time, in this period were written a number of plays which, while largely experimental and consequently tentative, formed a basis for the development of bourgeois drama in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Arden of Feversham, in spite of the fact that it lacks a broader spirit and universal appeal, is a well-written drama, and the work of Dekker and of Heywood in this particular genre is by no means to be neglected. Before glancing at one or two of the typical productions in this style it may be noted that here we possess the one unquestioned contribution of the English stage to the dramatic form in general. After all, Shakespeare inaugurated nothing entirely new in the world of the theatre ; the Spanish drama was as romantic as his. In the domestic tragedy, on the other hand, there is something distinctively novel. A few domestic dramas had been produced on the Continent, but it was in England alone that there appeared a truly genuine tragedy based on contemporary situations. The importance of this fact becomes evident when we consider that the bourgeois drama has become in our own times the chief means of expression for tragic playwrights.

BRITISH DRAMA

The first appearance of a truly great play of the crudely realistic type after the production of Arden of Feversham was A Yorkshire Tragedy. Not so New as Lamentable and true (c. 1606 ; printed 1608). This work, which contains only ten scenes, was part of a larger whole entitled All's One, or, Foure Plaies in One, a performance no doubt similar to Beaumont and Fletcher's Four Plays, or Moral Representations in One (date unknown ; printed 1647), consisting of several short pieces bound together by some slight common tie. This type of performance, decidedly anti-classical in tendency, was popular in the last years of the sixteenth century, as we know from Henslowe's Diary, and preserved its popularity in D'Avenant's The Play-House to be Lett (c. 1663 ; printed 1673) and in Jacob's The Nest of Plays (1738). The type of performance may still be found, although without the common tie, in Grand Guignol répertoires. A Yorkshire Tragedy is, on the title-page, attributed to Shakespeare, but most critics are agreed in finding nothing of his hand in the drama. It is peculiar, however, that both of these early domestic tragedies should have been given to him, one by a contemporary printer and the other by a critic of the eighteenth century. The husband of this later play is a powerfully delineated type, and the crude realism of the work is given something of a monumental tone by his villainy, repentance, and final series of ghastly murders. There is an advance here on the characterization of Arden of Feversham, and there seems, in spite of the shortness of the piece, an attempt at securing some broader and loftier appeal.

Between the appearance of Arden of Feversham and this drama not a few works of a similar type, but of a lesser value, had appeared. Records of what were evidently bourgeois tragedies now lost are to be found in Henslowe's Diary; and besides these bare records there have been preserved an anonymous drama styled A warning for Faire Women (printed 1599), Robert Yarington's ¹ Two Lamentable Tragedies (printed 1601), as well as Thomas Dekker's The Honest Whore (Part I 1604, Part II c. 1605; printed 1604 and 1630) and Thomas Heywood's A Woman Kilde with Kindnesse (1603; printed 1607). The Miseries of Inforst Mariage (1607), by George Wilkins, is further a tragi-comic version of the theme of A Yorkshire Tragedy, and Heywood's The English Traveller (c. 1627; printed 1633) a later example of the serious domestic play.
198

THE DOMESTIC DRAMA

The first and second of these dramas give really nothing new to the type. A Warning for Fair Women narrates the murder "of Master George Sanders of London Marchant, nigh Shooters hill"; the Two Lamentable Tragedies adds to a 'Babes in the Wood' theme the story of Merry's murder of Beech. Both are somewhat flamboyant productions and full of weak dialogue and impossible dramatic devices. With Dekker and Heywood, on the other hand, we reach a new form of drama, infinitely less crude than all the preceding efforts and containing not merely the narration of "horrid murthers," but genuine attempts at the expression of social problems and the portrayal of real characters.

The Honest Whore, in the first part of which Middleton had a share, may be taken as an introduction to this type, although already Heywood had brought out A Woman Killed with Kindness. It will be noted that this is not a tragedy in the ordinary sense of the term, nor is it a tragi-comedy of the Beaumont and Fletcher sort; it lies in a sphere outside of these, the sphere of the problem play and of the drame. Thought and feeling are cast into the conception of this drama, and in Orlando Friscobaldo, as ¹ Such is the name of the author on the title-page. This may be a mistake; the play has been given by Dr W. W. Greg to Day, Haughton, and Chettle.

BRITISH DRAMA

Hazlitt saw, we have one of the most living characters in the whole of seventeenth-century dramatic productivity. The problems that arise out of marital infidelity are here presented with a truth and profundity to which but few writers of the time could attain, and the scene at the opening of Act III in Part II, beyond the wit and gaiety of Infelice, has a depth of thought in it hard to equal. Infelice has pretended herself unfaithful to her husband Hippolito, in order thereby to sting him more for his own incontinency.

Inf. I beg but this ;

Set not my shame out to the worlds broad eye,
Yet let thy vengeance (like my fault) soare hye,
So it be in darkned clowdes.

Hip. Darkned ! my hornes

Cannot be darkned, nor shall my reuenge.
A Harlot to my slaue ? the act is base,
Common, but foule, so shall [not] thy disgrace.
Could not I feed your appetite ? oh women
You were created Angels, pure and faire ;
But since the first fell, tempting Devils you are ;
You should be mens blisse, but you proue their rods.
Were there no women, men might liue like gods.
You ha beene too much downe already, rise,
Get from my sight, and henceforth shun my bed,
Ile with no Strumpets breath be poysoned.
As for your Irish Lubrican,¹ that spirit
Whom by prepostrous charmes thy lust hath raised
In a wrong Circle, him Ile damne more blacke
Then any Tyrants soule.

Inf. Hipollito ?

Hip. Tell me, didst thou baite Hawkes to draw him to thee, or did he bewitch thee ?

Inf. The slaue did woo me.

Hip. Two wooes in that Skreech-owles language ? Oh who would trust your corcke-heeld sex ? I thinke to sate your lust, you would loue a Horse, a Beare, a croaking Toade, so your hot itching veines might haue their bound, then the wild Irish Dart was throwne. Come, how ? the manner of this fight.

Inf. 'Twas thus, he gaue me his battery first, Oh I Mistake, Beleue me, all this in beaten gold :
Yet I held out, but at length this was charm'd.

¹ 'Lubrican' is a variant of 'leprechaun,' an English form of an Irish word meaning a sprite or goblin.

THE DOMESTIC DRAMA

What ? change your Diamond wench, the act is base.
Common, but foule, so shall not your disgrace :
Could not I feed your appetite ? Oh Men,
You were created Angels, pure and faire,
But since the first fell, worse then Devils you are.
You should our shields be, but you proue our rods,
Were there no Men, women might liue like gods.
Guilty my Lord ?

Hip. Yes, guilty, my good Lady.

There is here something far beyond the callous and thoughtless treatment of intrigue and unfaithfulness visible in the average comedies of the time and in the tragi-comedies of the following decades.

In A Woman Killed with Kindness the stressing of the problem becomes even more marked. The story is essentially a simple one. Frankford and his wife are happily married, until the former's friend Wendoll, not sinful by nature but weak, seduces the latter. The husband, in his trust, suspects nothing, until his old servant breaks the truth to him. He pretends to leave for a journey, but returns in the dark of night to find his wife in his friend's embraces. Instead of murdering them both, as the convention of ordinary tragedy would have demanded, he pardons his still beloved Anne and sends her to live in seclusion at a lonely manor. There she pines, and, dying, sends for him. In his presence her repentant spirit passes away. As Heywood realized, there was little here of the ordinary dramatic fare ; and as warning he sent the prologue out before the audience :

I come but like a Harbenger being sent,
To tell you what these preparations meane :
Looke for no glorious state, our muse is bent
Vpon a barrein subiect : a bare sceane.
We could afford this twig a Timber tree,
Whose strength might boldly on your fauours build,
Our Russet, Tissew : Drone, a Hony-Bee,
Our barrein plot, a large and spacious field.
Our course fare, banquets : our thin Water, Wine :
Our Brooke, a Sea : our Bats eyes, Eagles sight :
Our Poets dull and earthy muse, Diuine.

In spite of the 'barrenness' of the theme, however,

BRITISH DRAMA

Heywood's play was instantly acclaimed, running to three editions by 1617. Nor is this surprising. The very story tells of the higher feeling of the author, and the treatment is worthy of the plot. The delicate touches by which the author depicts the wife's fall, the symbolic game of cards before the final discovery, the tremendous passion of the husband, all tell of a dramatic genius of no common sort. It is in the expression of this passion that Heywood rises to the heights of poetry. Nicholas the servant is about to wake the two guilty lovers; Frankford hinders him; then his thoughts pour forth in a torrent of agony:

Oh God, oh God, that it were possible
To vndo things done, to cal back yesterday;
That time could turne vp his swift sandy glasse,
To vntel the daies, and to redeeme these howres:
Or that the sunne
Could rising from the West, draw his coach backward
Take from the account of time so many minutes
Til he had al these seasons cald againe,
Those minutes and those actions done in them,
Euen from her first offence, that I might take her
As spotles as an Angel in my armes,
But oh: I talke of things impossible,
And cast beyond the moone, God giue me patience,
For I wil in to wake them.

I know of nothing more tremendous in the whole range of Elizabethan drama; there is here something of Shakespeare's greatness.

Not only the characterization of this play deserves attention, but the atmosphere given to the plot as a whole. There is nothing of fate in the defection of Mistress Frankford, but some supernatural element is constantly suggested. Frankford opens the day which is to embitter his whole life with a soliloquy on his happiness and security; Mistress Frankford herself falls into compliance with Wendoll as if some force were driving her on. She realizes fully the fine nature of her husband; she sees the heinousness of the sin she contemplates; and with an "Oh Master Wendoll Oh" she sinks into acquiescence. There is nothing here of mere licentious intrigue.

THE DOMESTIC DRAMA

The English Traveller presents the same features as does this early play, but these features are confused and marred by a sub-plot of Plautan comic type. The main story of this play likewise introduces a problem. Geraldine, a fine young English gentleman, whose culture has been increased by foreign travel, returns home. There he falls in love with the wife of an elderly friend of his, but, disdaining to wrong this friend, he pledges with her eternal chastity. At this point the villain, in the shape of a treacherous and licentious young gallant, enters into the development of the story. He succeeds in seducing the wife, and hints to various characters that Geraldine is guilty. In the end his evil practices are laid bare, and the wife dies of shame and repentance. One thing is noticeable in both these plays. Most of the early seventeenth-century dramatists were obsessed by the consciousness of sin ; they felt a kind of unholy horror in the contemplation of it, yet they were led deeper and deeper into the slough of despond. Considered from the purely æsthetic point of view, many of the most striking and most beautiful passages in the works of these dramatists are the passages which deal with the most obnoxious situations. Heywood stands apart. He is not interested in the psychology of sin as such ; he is interested in the reflection of that sin in the minds of others. Thus Frankford is more carefully drawn than Mrs Frankford ; Geraldine is a more complete portrait than is the erring wife. It is this which places Heywood so high among the playwrights of his time ; here at least one man preserved his sanity, his feelings of truth and honesty and goodness, unimpaired in the midst of what was a general corruption of manners and taste. The revelry of the Stuart Court passed him by, and he found solace and strength in the inherent nobility of the middle classes of his time.

The bourgeois drama, in spite of these early efforts, was doomed to give way to the more spectacular forces of the romantic tragi-comedy and of the horror tragedy ; heroic sentiments and the results of brilliant but diseased imaginations were to take the minds of men far from the contemplation of ordinary sorrows and ordinary joys.

BRITISH DRAMA

Yet the effort had been made, and was to bear fruit in the future. The author of Arden of Feversham, Dekker, and Heywood were to become the ancestors of the authors of The Orphan and of The London Merchant, and through these later writers the tradition was to be handed on to Lessing at the close of the eighteenth century and to Ibsen at the close of the nineteenth. Ibsen, in his turn, became the master of many of the most talented dramatists of our own age.

CHAPTER VIII

THE CHRONICLE HISTORY

ALREADY we have noted alongside of the development of what may be styled regular tragedy and comedy the appearance of the history play, first in a modified kind of morality form as in Bale's Kynge Johan and later in the various dramas, mostly anonymous, produced at the time when the University Wits were establishing the romantic drama in England. The University Wits themselves indulged in the form, Peele giving us his Edward I, Marlowe his Edward II, and Greene his more fantastic James IV. It was but natural that Shakespeare, following these University Wits, should make some attempts in this form. The chronicle history was popular in the nineties of the sixteenth century, partly because it allowed of bustle and action, partly because it could mingle together thoughts serious and merry, tragic and comic, and partly because there had come over England in those years a wave of patriotic sentiment. The Armada had just been scattered; Elizabeth had just made herself the unquestioned head of a unified nation and of an established Church. Men were thus eager to trace in dramatic form the development of England in the record of its kings, and to fight over again the many battles, glorious and inglorious, with their hereditary enemies across the Channel. Shakespeare, an actor himself and watching keenly the theatrical fashions of his time, seems, characteristically, to have determined to present as complete a set of historical dramas as lay in his power.

Tentatively enough he started with the three parts of Henry the Sixth (1592; printed 1623), in which he apparently worked over the existing productions of elder contemporaries. Opinion has differed widely as to his share in these dramas. The Folio editors believed them to be his, but more progressive critics of recent times have decided that but little remains in them of the master's writing. It is hard to dogmatize over a matter such as this, but, recognizing that these are the earliest of Shakespeare's efforts in the dramatic world, we may perhaps believe that much of the distinctly inferior dialogue is possibly his, penned at a time before he found his own true method of expression.

BRITISH DRAMA

The Tragedy of King Richard the third (? 1593 ; printed 1597) evidently came next, and here Shakespeare, while following an earlier tragedy on the same theme and altering that earlier work in the spirit of Marlowe, has secured something of an individual note. It is not that here Shakespeare has secured perfect characterization or perfect form, but Richard is a firmly drawn character. The passion that is in him, the gleaming eyes of the man staring hungrily at his goal, show an advance on anything which had gone before. We may say that the Lady Anne scene is impossible ; we may compare unfavourably the scene wherein the messenger announces the approach of Richard's foes with the similar scene in Macbeth ; we may condemn the introduction of the melodramatic ghosts, but at the same time we realize that in this play we have an ordered whole which retains its beauty in spite of the many obvious blemishes in the development of the plot.

In The Tragedie of King Richard the second (1595-6 ; printed 1597) Shakespeare has achieved more individuality of utterance, although many of the minor characters are lacking in personality, and the sharply contrasted Richard and Bolingbroke remind us of the similar contrast in Edward II. This tragedy is more lyrical than the other, not only in the general dialogue, but in the characterization of Richard, who is nothing if not a dreamer and a poet. All the King's soliloquies are couched in a rich, ecstatic language. He is 'conceited' as Romeo is, and even when he lies imprisoned in Pomfret Castle he indulges in his habitual lyricism.

Musicke do I heare ?

Ha, ha ? keepe time : How sowre sweet Musicke is,
When Time is broke, and no Proportion kept ?
So is it in the Musicke of mens liues :
And heere haue I the daintinesse of eare,

THE CHRONICLE HISTORY

To heare time broke in a disorder'd string ;
But for the Concord of my State and Time,
Had not an eare to heare my true Time broke,
I wasted Time, and now doth Time waste me :
For now hath Time made me his numbring clocke ;
My Thoughts, are minutes ; and with Sighes they iarre,
Their watches on vnto mine eyes, the outward Watch,
Whereto my finger, like a Dialls point,
Is pointing still, in cleansing them from teares.
Now sir, the sound that tels what houre it is,
Are clamorous groanes, that strike vpon my heart,
Which is the bell : so Sighes, and Teares, and Grones,
Shew Minutes, Houres, and Times : but my Time
Runs poasting on, in Bullingbrookes proud ioy,
While I stand fooling heere, his iacke o' th' Clocke.
This Musicke mads me, let it sound no more,
For though it haue holpe madmen to their wits,
In me it seemes, it will make wise-men mad :
Yet blessing on his heart that giues it me ;
For 'tis a signe of loue, and loue to Richard,
Is a strange Brooch, in this all-hating world.

Here Shakespeare is writing history in the terms of Romeo and Juliet.

It is highly probable that, a year before the appearance of Richard II, The Life and Death of King John (printed 1623) was produced. This drama, based on The Troublesome Reign of King John, is nearer in spirit to the first than to the second of the Richard plays. Shakespeare has kept close to his original, although his omissions as well as his additions betoken care and thought. The very opening shows us this, where Shakespeare, omitting about thirty lines of the original, has been able to plunge in medias res. Two things are particularly noticeable in this drama in general. The first is the fact that, in structure, it is least like a chronicle history. Several salient facts in John's career have been selected, so that the form is more co-ordinate and unified than it is in either Richard III or Richard II. The second point of interest is the patriotism of the piece. Nowhere has Shakespeare deviated so much from history in order to praise the English and condemn the French. As in Richard II, there is little humour, save that of a peculiarly sarcastic nature put into the mouth of the Bastard Faulconbridge, but there appears here in Constance a woman character more finely drawn than any other of Shakespeare's historical women types.

BRITISH DRAMA

So far Shakespeare's endeavours in the realm of historical drama had not shown anything of peerless excellence, but about 1596 or 1597 appeared the true masterpiece of The History of Henrie the Fourth (printed 1598), followed by The Second part of Henrie the fourth (1597-8; printed 1600). Instead of gloomy tragedy or lyrical passion there is trans-fused into this play a genuinely realistic and humorous tone. Out of the sketch of the character of a certain Sir John Oldcastle Shakespeare developed the now immortal figure of Falstaff, one who, as we have seen, belongs to the realm of the romantic comedy. That Shakespeare did not feel quite at ease in the company of this witty old rascal is shown probably by the 'rejection of Falstaff' at the close of the second part of the play, and by the record of his death in The Chronicle History of Henry the fift (1599; printed 1600), the last of this series of history plays. Concerning Henry V opinions have been various. Regarded impartially, the drama does seem to mark a falling off from the others. Nowhere save in the suspect Merry Wives of Windsor has Shakespeare presented us with such palpable 'humours,' not only in Nym, Bardolph, and Pistol, but in Fluellen, Gower, Macmorris, and Jamy. It is observable how the older characters taken over from Henry IV have changed. Doll Tearsheet is dead, and the narration of Falstaff's end gives occasion for one of the most touching speeches in the play; Nym and Bardolph are hanged, and Pistol, waxing old, must turn to theft. The old company has passed away for ever. Nor is Henry here by any means the Hal of merry memory in Henry IV. The whole atmosphere has altered; and Mr J. M. Robertson has many points of evidence in his favour when he relieves Shakespeare from the burden of much of the language and plot-development.

Immediately after the production of Henry V Shakespeare turned to write his greater tragedies; he was not to return to the history play until he collaborated with

THE CHRONICLE HISTORY

Fletcher in penning The Famous History of the Life of King Henry the Eighth (c. 1613; printed 1623), an infinitely slighter and less enthralling drama than any which had preceded it. The figure of Wolsey certainly rises to lofty heights, but there is a weakness in the drama as a whole. The age of the chronicle history had passed away.

Few are the attempts in this style in the seventeenth century. Samuel Rowley has one to his credit in When you see me, You know me (c. 1603; printed 1605), interesting because it deals with the subject-matter of the last-mentioned drama. Here also Wolsey's character is that best developed, but the clownage in many of the scenes ruins entirely the unity of effect. John Ford has another in The Chronicle Historie of Perkin Warbeck (printed 1634), a well-written drama with an excellently delineated title-rôle. Except for these, however, we may say that the chronicle history was dead by the end of the sixteenth century.

Several reasons, perhaps, may be brought forward to account for this sudden disappearance of the type. The first, and most obvious, is the fact that the chief themes had been worn out. So recent a reign as that of Elizabeth could not be dealt with, and before the time of King John there was probably hardly sufficient historical material for the dramatists to build their structures aright. But this could hardly be all. We must take into account, too, the weakening spirit of patriotism at the time. Men were less adventurous and England-loving than they had been at the close of the sixteenth century, and were accordingly less interested in the affairs of their country in the past. It is noticeable that Chapman, in turning to historical drama, took his themes not from English, but from French chronicles. The romantic spirit, also, was leading men away from realism and the depiction of fact. In this connexion the early Britain dramas are instructive. Possibly they owed some of their popularity to patriotic sentiment, but it was a patriotic sentiment far different from that which had inspired the hearts of Drake and of Raleigh. Artificiality and hazy, fanciful sentiment had taken the place of reality and forceful thought.

CHAPTER IX

THE MASQUE

NO account of English drama could be complete without a note, at least, devoted to the development of the masque, although the masque is in no wise connected with the popular stage, and in some ways is distinctly undramatic. At the same time there are many masques essentially dramatic in form, and masques of a sort were introduced into regular plays, as, for example, in The Tempest.

The masque arose out of courtly revelry. The disguisings of early days when the king and his nobles accompanied by the queen and her ladies strove to make the nights bright with rich and fanciful pageantry easily developed into the spoken masque. In origin the disguising and masquerading of earlier days is thoroughly English; but this native strain met in the beginning and middle of the sixteenth century with a Continental element taken via France from Italy, and so developed toward the close of the century the typically Elizabethan and Stuart masque. Herein fanciful poetry usually of a eulogistic kind met with rich costuming and the spirit of adventurous intrigue. Masquers came from their places, and, mingling with the spectators, danced with them. For a moment care was thrown to the winds, and under the flaring torchlights or milder glimmer of the candles knights and ladies laughed away the time or danced over the rush-strewn floors.

The masque proper, at least as we know it to-day, is rather a Stuart than an Elizabethan development. Sir Philip Sidney, certainly, has left us his May Lady (1578; printed in The Countesse of Pembrokes Arcadia, 1598), but the full development of the type does not come till we reach the time of Ben Jonson in the early seventeenth century. After one or two "entertainments" Jonson penned his Masque of Blacknesse (1605; printed 1608), which was so successful for its poetry and for the artistic co-operation of the author and Inigo Jones, the artificer, that Jonson was called on again and again to provide similar pieces for the delectation of the Court. Other writers too were bidden to prepare these royal spectacles—Thomas Campion, Samuel Daniel, Francis Beaumont, George Chapman, Thomas Carew, Sir William D'Avenant, and James Shirley. Others were commissioned to write pieces for nobles of the realm; Milton himself penned Comus for the Bridgewater family.

THE MASQUE

It is impossible here to spare space for a lengthy discussion of these works, but one or two salient points may be noted in general. The first concerns the structure of the masque itself. Up to Jonson's time the masque was a fanciful entity, but in The Masque of Queenes (1609) he introduced a feature which was already apparent in an undeveloped form in the sixteenth century—a dance of "anticks" forming what came to be known technically as the antimasque. This antimasque contributed something of a satyric note to the work, and the novelty inherent in the contrast between the gorgeous splendour of the masque proper and the contorted or 'antick' forms of the antimasque assured the latter full popularity.

The second point concerns a question of dramatic history. After the early masques of James I's reign and of the first years of that of Charles I the masque fashion, apparently for financial reasons, fell into disfavour. Possibly the later specimens of this kind would never have been produced had it not been for the appearance in 1632 of Prynne's famous diatribe against Court and stage entitled Histrionastix. As with one accord the Cavaliers, reacting to this Puritan attack, took to themselves an added bravado. Some of the most gorgeous masques of the whole seventeenth century appeared just after the publication of this work—Carew's notorious Cælum Britannicum (1633; printed 1634), Shirley's A Contention for Honour and Riches (printed 1633) and his more famous Triumph of Peace (1633-4), and Sir William D'Avenant's Salmacida

BRITISH DRAMA

Spolia (1639-40).¹ It is observable that Milton's Arcades (printed 1645) and Comus (1634; printed 1637) fall within this period of Cavalier enthusiasm against the Puritan opposition to staging and riotous revelry.

The staging of these masques also requires our attention. In the endeavours of Inigo Jones, assisted by Jonson and the Court favour, we find the first definite approach toward modern systems of scenic display. The masques certainly were Court functions, wholly dissociated from the popular stages, but that cannot take away from the importance of Inigo Jones' innovations. With the desire for richness the elaboration of scenery and 'machines' proved inevitable. From Italy Jones no doubt brought back with him many ideas for the development of scenic art in England and put these into practice in the palace shows. At first working with a single set scene, he elaborated a kind of shifting setting, attained first by a triangular frame which could be turned to show separate and distinct pieces of scenery, later by the employment of flats and side-wings running in grooves. The importance of these innovations has already been commented upon. The influence of Jones' endeavours is to be seen in the production of Aglaure previously mentioned; his own pupil and assistant, John Webb, aided D'Avenant in the arrangements for The Siege of Rhodes in 1656; and D'Avenant was the first to establish regular scenery on the public stage of England, as he was one of the last to be associated as poet in the production of a Court masque. The age was moving forward, and the establishment of the 'picture-frame' stage would have been effected even although no Commonwealth régime had apparently broken the line of theatrical tradition.

.

A backward glance at the history of drama from 1600 to 1642 shows a general movement toward the elaboration of spectacular elements, revealed in their own way in this masque scenery. The strong idealistic drama of the early years was being slowly crushed out of existence both by crude realism and by artificial romance. On the one hand the followers of Jonson were bringing vulgarity and crudity into the theatre. On the other the followers of Beaumont and Fletcher were introducing weaker or more corrupt emotions, artificiality of plot and of character-drawing, thrillingly startling effects, and spectacular novelties. Against the general tendency of the times a few men are seen striving—Dekker in his fresh, naturalistic comedy, Heywood in his bourgeois drama, Massinger more feebly in his serious but vitiated rhetorical tragedies.

¹ Already D'Avenant had written and produced The Temple of Love (1634), The Triumphs of the Prince d'Amour (1635-6), and Britannia Triumphans (1637).

THE MASQUE

The contrast between the two extremes of ultra-realism and of ultra-artificiality prepares the way for the two main types of Restoration drama. Men have lost the true feeling of moral right, of high thinking, of sincerity; they appreciate wit far more than all of these; and accordingly we are not far from the period when Etherege was to found the comedy of manners. With the loss of honourable and moral sentiments true nobility of character has gone, and elaborate disquisitions on courage and virtue take their place. Here we find the basis for the development of the heroic drama, where courage, virtue, honesty, honour, are all exaggerated to such a height that they cease to bear any resemblance to these qualities as exemplified in actual life.

At the same time, while we note this general decay and decadence in the age, we cannot fail to discern the true greatness in drama continued from Elizabethan times. Ford, Webster, and Shirley are all true poets; Fletcher is a genius in his own style of drama; Massinger's serious temper, D'Avenant's romantic aspirations, Middleton's gloomy thoughts, Tourneur's dark imagination, have all in them the breath of inspiration, and Jonson stands like a burly colossus over his age. The richness of the period is unquestioned, even when we recognize that it is a richness like to that of a flower, passing beyond its spring-tide, becoming florid and indelicate, eventually to wither away into aridity. If the metaphor be retained, however, there seems still further truth to be wrung from it. The seeds of this flower which in maturity was Shakespeare, scattered not only in England, but all over the world, gave birth to a new plant as sturdy and almost as beautiful as the old. If we cast our gaze over Europe in the eighteenth century we can see that everywhere it was the Elizabethan drama which inspired the rising theatres of the Continent, and drove back the chilling theories of neo-classical France, until, in time, France itself gave way and in Victor Hugo produced a romantic and bizarre genius akin to Shakespeare himself. Nor is Shakespeare alone. Massinger has fired the enthusiasm of not only one Continental writer ; Heywood, as we have seen, stands at the head of a vast and far-reaching dramatic tradition never more keenly alive than it is to-day ; Ford has captured the fancy of one of the best known of modern playwrights, the mystic and symbolic Maurice Maeterlinck. This is the period, after all, which created our greatest national treasure, a treasure which has become the heritage of all mankind.

BRITISH DRAMA

PART III

RESTORATION DRAMA

CHAPTER I

THE SOCIAL AND THEATRICAL ENVIRONMENT DRAMA DURING THE COMMONWEALTH

DRAMA UNDER THE PURITANS

THE theatres were officially closed by Commonwealth ordinance in 1642 ; theoretically there was no further acting in England until 1660 saw the restoration of Charles II. Appearances, however, are often deceptive, and we cannot assume either that the firmly established love of theatrical shows was completely suppressed during these eighteen years of dramatic silence, or that there was during this period any marked break in the theatrical tradition. Recent research is tending to prove that the old theory which insisted that the Restoration drama had very little to do with the Elizabethan was false, because it was based on an insufficient sifting of the evidence.

There is no question but that the Puritan authorities were determined to put a stop to all sorts of amusement, innocent and otherwise ; but there is equally no question but that the actors and spectators frequently evaded the vigilance of the soldiery and presented their shows in defiance of authority. Acting in the Commonwealth period was of two kinds : at the old theatres with performances by some of the players of Caroline days, and at theatres, booths, inns, halls, by bands of actors who put before the spectators 'drolls' or farces. It would appear that the latter were fairly common, and may not have come so much under the disapprobation of the Puritans as the former. These drolls were usually short one-act farces taken from well-known plays. Thus the more rudely comic portions of A Midsummer Night's Dream were extracted from the play as a whole, and the result performed under the title of Bottom the Weaver. Of these drolls two collections are extant, one entitled The Wits, published in 1662, and the other The Stroler's Pacquet Open'd, issued in 1742. This droll tradition is an important one, for it ran its course by the side of the regular theatre tradition right on to the close of the eighteenth century. Nor does an account of the acting of drolls exhaust the theatrical activities of the Commonwealth period. Regular plays too were frequently to be seen on the boards. Whenever the actors could gather an audience together in one of the several half-dismantled playhouses they would, no doubt in most unseemly haste, hurry through some Beaumont and Fletcher or Shakespeare drama. Sometimes these performances were interrupted by the rude entrance of the Puritan soldiers, and then the affair was put into the primitive newspapers of the time; more often than not the players must have got off unscathed, and all record of the performance must irretrievably have been lost. There are many extant accounts of acting during these years, and those accounts, we must presume, are but roughly indicative of a fairly constant series of irregular performances both in London and in the provinces. The continuity of tradition was thus in two distinct ways being preserved.

BRITISH DRAMA

Nor were these the only means by which the earlier Caroline theatre was connected with the later. Some of the actors at least formed themselves into a company and set off for Germany under the leadership of one George Jolly, who was later to associate himself with William Beeston, formerly master or governor of the King's company of child players, at Salisbury Court. His répertoire must have been composed of well-known Elizabethan, Jacobean, and Caroline plays, and the acting traditions of earlier days must have been carried on by his activities over the eighteen years of theatre suppression. William Beeston himself forms another link. This man, whom Dryden called the Chronicle of the Stage, was the son of Christopher

SOCIAL & THEATRICAL ENVIRONMENT

Beeston, who had known Shakespeare and Spenser in the opening years of the seventeenth century. It is likely that William Beeston, owner in 1660 of the Salisbury Court playhouse and associated with D'Avenant in the latter's theatrical undertakings, played the part of a maestro to the younger players. These acting links are completed in Sir William D'Avenant, one who was intimately associated with the theatre in the days of Charles I and who became leader of a patent company under Charles II. His own operatic endeavours in The Siege of Rhodes and other similar pieces performed during the last years of the Commonwealth period provide a pleasant little oasis of licensed acting in the midst of an otherwise arid desert.

Many of those who were not of the severest Puritanical convictions looked back to the theatrical glories of days gone by, and kept alive in their hearts the love of acting. The various links we have already glanced at serve to show the binding together of the theatre tradition as far as actual performances and methods of acting are concerned; but the tradition of the written play was also preserved in several distinct ways. Many of the players at least found their regular sources of income taken away from them, and they were forced to dispose of that which in earlier days they had jealously guarded. It is a peculiar fact that in the early seventeenth century the players seem to have believed that a drama unprinted was more likely to be popular in the theatre than a drama published. Accordingly they held in their tiring-rooms stacks of manuscripts which they refused to sell to the 'stationers.' Only in times of distress—as, for instance, during the periods when the playhouses were shut because of the plague—did they reluctantly dispose of their treasures. There are, of course, obvious exceptions. Heminge and Condell issued in 1623 many then unpublished works of Shakespeare, apparently as a kind of last service to their deceased friend; Jonson evidently looked upon his plays as his own property and had his Works printed in 1616; but normally the various dramas were regarded as the possessions of those companies by whom they had first been produced. During the Commonwealth period many of these plays were released by the actors. It is probably to the Commonwealth restrictions that we owe many of the best works of Beaumont and Fletcher, issued by the actors in 1647, and the eighteen years of suppression are plentifully studded with the publication of various independent plays. That this publication would have been impossible without a corresponding reading public is a necessary assumption ; there were many in England who, remembering pleasant days spent in the theatres, turned from the stage to the study and perused there their favourite tragedies and comedies of Shakespeare, of Beaumont and Fletcher, or of Shirley.

(ii) THE RESTORATION THEATRE

In 1660 Charles II returned to his throne amid the rejoicings of a nation wearied of the excessive restrictions of the Commonwealth era, and his band of devoted Cavaliers, who had shared his exile with him, joined with the many people in England eager for a return of earlier Caroline traditions. No sooner was Charles on his throne than bodies of actors were formed into companies. George Jolly hurried back from Germany ; William Beeston hastily opened up the Salisbury Court theatre ; Killigrew gathered together the remnants of the old King's men ; D'Avenant collected a body of young actors, untrained, but eager for histrionic glory. The King, however, was anxious to keep the affairs of the theatre in his own hands, and within a few months of his accession he had issued orders and patents by which the number of companies was limited to two, one under Killigrew, who may be regarded as the last royal jester, and another under D'Avenant. These two companies settled down to a comfortable monopoly, the first at the various Theatres Royal, the second at the Duke's houses in Lincoln's Inn Fields and in Dorset Garden. In 1682 both were amalgamated into one, and remained so until the year 1695 saw the secession of a number of the best actors. The first point we note, then, is this, that for thirteen years one theatre supplied all the needs of London, and that for the other twenty-seven years to the end of the century only two theatres were running. When we remember that a smaller London of thirty or forty years [previously had been able to support as many as six theatres running concurrently it becomes obvious that some great change had come over the playgoing public. That change is really the culmination of the gradual movement we have seen growing in the early years of the century. The theatre has degenerated completely into a thing of the Court. The middle classes for the most part keep away. A few of the unaristocratic people of the time, such as Pepys, may have attended the theatre during these years, but such people were those who sought for Court preferment or who aped in one way or another the manners and tastes of the Cavaliers. All we know of the theatre in these times proves conclusively that the typical audience was composed of the courtiers, their ladies, the beaux, and the 'wits,' with a sprinkling of the riff-raff of the town. The playhouse had become the rather riotous haunt of the upper classes, and, as a consequence, the plays written for that playhouse were distinctly calculated by the authors to appeal to a courtly and Cavalier audience. It is this that explains both the rise of the heroic tragedy and the elaboration of the comedy of manners. The one appealed to artificial aristocratic sentiments on the subject of honour ; the other reflected the morally vicious but intellectually brilliant atmospheres of the salons and the chocolate-houses.

SOCIAL & THEATRICAL ENVIRONMENT

A return will be made later to this question of the influence of the audience upon Restoration drama ; at present a few words must be said concerning the actual structure of the playhouses and on the influence exercised by that structure upon the plays of the time. In three particular ways the Restoration theatre differed from the Elizabethan. Save for the first few years after 1660, when some of the older playhouses were utilized by the actors, there was no appearance at this time of the open-air 'public' theatre of earlier days. The new theatres were, with one early exception, roofed in, and consequently lit by artificial light. Moreover, the first new premises occupied by the players were not of the square inn-yard type, but were converted tennis-courts, oblong in shape. It is obvious that in houses of this sort the Elizabethan platform stage would have been out of the question; on the other hand, tradition pointed to a stage surrounded by the audience. A compromise was effected whereby a proscenium arch, unknown in the early seventeenth century save in the masques at Court, cut off part of the theatre, and an 'apron' in the form of a semicircle jutted out into the midst of the pit. There is here the ideal union of two mutually opposing systems of staging. Intimacy with the audience could still be secured by the players when they moved to the forward portion of the stage, and yet there remained the possibility of scenic display in the back portion of the house. We shall expect to find, therefore, and do find, that the plays written for this theatre show many anomalies. They are transition plays, at one and the same time looking back to the earlier platform stage with its free conventions, and looking forward to the development of a new theatre. For the first few years it is natural that the dramatists should not have learned how to write for the altered stage; their plays are cast in the Elizabethan form. Gradually, however, the exigencies of the changed conditions made themselves felt; playwrights realized the needs of the actors, and their plays, because of the influence of the scenery, became more co-ordinate and less scattered in subject-matter than the plays written in Shakespeare's time. Only in the very spectacular productions of the period do we discover shifting of locality such as appears, for example, in Antony and Cleopatra or in King Lear.

BRITISH DRAMA

The presence of this scenery, added to the fact that lighting of a primitive sort accompanied all plays, led to the loss of one important Elizabethan convention. We have already seen how Shakespeare was forced to explain to his audience where his actors were and at what time the action was supposed to take place. This was rendered necessary because of the lack of scenic arrangements and of lighting. In the Restoration theatre (which may be regarded fundamentally as the modern theatre) such notices to the audience would have been superfluous, and consequently as we study the drama of this period we can see them slowly disappearing, year by year. More and more was left to the scene designer and to the machinist ; more, that is to say, was left to the eye and less to the ear. While this made for greater concentration in the plays themselves and prevented minor dramatists from wandering into would-be poetical disquisitions on Nature's loveliness, it took away to a certain extent from the beauty of the plays. Many of the most gorgeous passages of pure poetry in the Elizabethan drama had been essentially undramatic save for the fact that they were rendered necessary by the type of playhouse ; and the loss of opportunities for the natural introduction of such passages tended to kill the purely poetic drama.

SOCIAL & THEATRICAL ENVIRONMENT

The third point which is to be noted concerning the Restoration theatre is the introduction of actresses. In the former years all the players were men or boys ; French comédiennes brought over in the reign of Charles I were apparently hissed out of London. The pleasure-loving Charles II, however, had seen many performances by women during his exile abroad, and he evidently decided that the introduction of actresses here would be a good thing. Cynically enough he pretended he was bringing about the innovation in the interests of morality. Probably no one believed him, but on the other hand no one objected, and a woman first appeared on the English stage to speak the prologue to Othello and play the part of Desdemona. Just at first the number of women capable of fulfilling their tasks must have been small, and boys continued occasionally to take feminine rôles, but by 1670 the establishment of the actress was complete. Not only was a Betterton and a Mohun praised, but a Nell Gwyn, a Moll Davis, a Mrs Barry, a Mrs Bracegirdle, and a Mrs Oldfield. It is unnecessary here to point out the many changes, good and bad, which these women brought into the theatre. It is unnecessary, too, to point to the increased immorality which they aided in settling on the stage. But one influence may be noted here. For the most part, the early seventeenth-century writers were diffident about bringing women into their plays. There is a Rosalind and a Celia in As You Like It, but they are vastly outnumbered by their men companions. There are only two women in Hamlet, three in Othello, two in Macbeth, three in King Lear. With the advent of actresses, on the other hand, it became more and more necessary to provide suitable parts for the Nell Gwyns and the Mrs Bracegirdles. When D'Avenant (if he indeed be guilty) came to alter Macbeth he saw the necessity of enlarging the parts of both Lady Macbeth and Lady Macduff; and when the same author in collaboration with Dryden sought to improve The Tempest the two authors provided Miranda with a sister and Ariel with a spirit mate. This tendency, noticeable in the adaptations of Shakespeare, is visible everywhere in the more original tragedies and comedies of the time. With the Restoration the position of women in the dramatic world was thoroughly established.

BRITISH DRAMA

This consideration of the influence of theatrical conditions upon the drama of the late seventeenth century might be infinitely extended, but the features noted above appear to be those which are of main importance, necessary to be borne in mind whenever the works of this period are especially considered. As with the Elizabethan dramatic literature, it is possible to estimate aright the plays produced in the reign of Charles II only when these plays are related intimately with the theatre wherein they were first performed. The drama of this later period, based as it was on the drama of the past, yet developed certain new tendencies, tendencies which are dependent largely upon the audience and upon the theatre.

CHAPTER II

THE HEROIC TRAGEDY AND THE RETURN TO SHAKESPEARE

LOVE AND HONOUR DRAMA

THE period of the Restoration is remarkable for the development of several distinct species of drama which were destined to become the typical forms of theatrical activity or to give rise to equally typical cognate forms in the following century. These types of drama, of which the heroic tragedy, the comedy of manners, the opera, and the farce are the chief, all display a union of diverse forces. Each, regarded from one point of view, is the lineal descendant of some species of pre-Restoration drama, yet each is coloured and modified by the influence of contemporary Continental theatrical literature. The heroic tragedy is thus merely a further elaboration of those romantic plays which were first made popular by Beaumont and Fletcher. The Love and Honour which move throughout each specimen of this kind is no new thing. D'Avenant knew of the contest arising from the close opposition of these two sentiments, and the exaggerated, flamboyant language which is now associated most nearly with the tragic efforts of Dryden and Settle was anticipated by more than one dramatist of the early seventeenth century. On the other hand, we have the testimony of Roger Boyle, Earl of Orrery, who was the first to attempt the introduction of the new style into England, that the employment of rime in place of blank verse in these heroic plays was due to the influence of France, exerted through the enthusiasm of the King. Nor was it only in outer form that the Restoration dramatists modified their styles to accord with the prevailing tastes in Paris. The heroic drama, with its grandiloquent sentiments and its air of exaggeration, is to be regarded in one way as the representative in the theatre of the mood and atmosphere of the heroic poem, a form of literature which, popularized by men such as Chamberlayne and D'Avenant, had come from France in the middle of the century. The comedy of manners, likewise, is an admixture of similar ingredients. Its source lies in the endeavours of Jonson in the comedy of humours and in those of Fletcher in the comedy of intrigue. Everywhere we can trace in its form the older strains altered a trifle to suit the tastes of a later age. The witty, debonair, callous, philandering air of Congreve's muse is intimately akin to the sterner and more satiric muse of Jonson. Yet much of what we know now as the comedy of manners would have remained unwritten, or would have been written in a different style, had the English theatre not possessed Molière for a guide and a model. It is not, as some modern critics have sought to make out, that the English comedy of the late seventeenth century was nothing more than a weakened replica of the contemporary comedy of France, but we must never neglect the influence exerted, directly and indirectly, upon Etherege and Wycherley and Congreve by the master of French comedy. The same analysis of forces holds good, also, for farce and opera. Farcical elements enough are apparent in sixteenth- and seventeenth-century comedies, and the later farce of the Restoration and Georgian eras owes a great deal of its vitality to older examples. The first afterpiece, however, and the first true English farce—Otway's The Cheats of Scapin (1676; printed 1677)—was but an adaptation from the French, and many of the other similar pieces produced in the last decades of the seventeenth century and in the years that followed were either alterations of French farcical works or farcical renderings of true comedies originally written by Molière and his companions. In the same way the Restoration opera, made glorious by the music of Purcell, was a purely native development, even although it might not have come into being had it not been for the operatic efforts of Renaissance Italy and the cognate efforts of contemporary France. It cannot be too often asserted that, despite the immense change which had come over the

BRITISH DRAMA

THE HEROIC TRAGEDY

English theatre with the advent of Charles II, the substratum of all the dramatic activities during the latter half of the seventeenth century was, in the main, English. The great wave of enthusiasm for the theatre, which had risen to surge with Shakespeare, was still eddying along the shore, slightly disturbed but not clearly altered in its course by neighbouring cross-currents.

In the realm of tragedy the heroic element already glanced at was unquestionably the most potent in this period, but the heroic play did not by any means stand alone. While Charles patronized the love and honour drama, and, in patronizing it, gave the tone to the whole of courtly taste, and while heroic sentiment was in accordance with the rapidly crystallizing classicism of the age, it must ever be remembered that Shakespeare still held his honoured place on the stage and that practically every writer and critic of the time, with the notorious exception of Rymer, realized and commented upon Shakespeare's genius. The wilder excesses of the heroic style as well as the later dullness of the pseudo-classic formality were alike tempered by reminiscences of Hamlet and Othello and Lear, and from the appearance of Dryden's All for Love (1677 ; printed 1678), written confessedly in imitation of Shakespeare's style, may be dated a period when writer after writer attempted, however unsuccessfully, to pen dramas which might recall something of the earlier Elizabethan temper. For the first twenty years of the Restoration period, on the other hand, the heroic mood predominated over all others, in spite of the occasional appearance of tragedies which might, save for one or two characters or scenes, have been penned before 1642. This heroic mood has frequently been analysed. Its crudities, its violent rants and inflammatory speeches, its impossible psychology, its exalted idealism fossilized in the twin forces of love and honour, have all been noted, from contemporary times to the present. Buckingham's The Rehearsal (1671 ; printed 1672), burlesque as it is, hardly exaggerates the follies inherent in perfectly serious dramas of the time. Even the delightful soliloquy of Prince Prettiman over his boots, which closes with his going out, one leg booted and the other bootless, can be paralleled by equally ridiculous scenes in plays written in the fond expectation that they would arouse those emotions of awe and pity which Aristotle finds the chief ends of all tragic endeavour. Such may be found not only in minor works as Pordage's Herod and Mariamne (1673) or Settle's The Empress of Morocco (1673), but in the better efforts of John Dryden himself.

BRITISH DRAMA

Undoubtedly Dryden is the greatest, and perhaps the first, who took up this style of writing. The uncertainty concerning his claims to priority is due to the fact that it is not ascertainable now when the first production of the earliest effort of Roger Boyle, Earl of Orrery, took place. Two things, however, are clear. Dryden was anticipated in the actual writing of heroic plays not only by Orrery, who was engaged on a drama of this type as early as 1660, but by an otherwise unknown George Cartwright, who has left us a single tragedy, The Heroick Lover (1661), framed on the model made popular several years later. It is possible, however, that none of these earlier plays was acted until several years had elapsed, although a fair claim has been made for an early production of Orrery's The Black Prince, and Dryden clearly stands forward as the popularizer, if not the prime mover, of this type of drama. It was he who gave it impetus; it was he who, by his recantation, aided in drawing men's minds once more away from rime and heroics to blank verse and Shakespeare. Starting with The Indian Queen (1664; printed 1665), a drama written in collaboration with Sir Robert Howard, he led the van of the love and honour playwrights until the appearance of All for Love, or The World well Lost (1677; printed 1678) showed that he was growing tired of his long-loved mistress, rime. Between 1664 and 1677 he gave at least five of these dramas to the theatre—The Indian Emperour, or, The Conquest of Mexico by the Spaniards (1665; printed 1667), Tyrannick Love, or the Royal Martyr (1669; printed 1670), The Conquest of Granada by the Spaniards: In Two Parts (1670; printed 1672), and Aureng-Zebe (1675; printed 1676)—besides the rimed

THE HEROIC TRAGEDY

'opera' wrought out of Milton's Paradise Lost entitled The State of Innocence, and Fall of Man (printed 1677). All the five heroic plays are built upon a set plan. There is in each a hero of superhuman prowess and with superhuman ideals; there is a heroine of unsurpassed constancy and beauty; there is an inner conflict in the minds of several of the characters between love and honour; there is a stirring story of fighting and martial enthusiasm, filled with intense dramatic interest. In general scope this heroic tragedy of Dryden's is surprisingly like the general scope of the Shakespearian drama, if we make allowances for the frequent happy ending which the Restoration author, probably influenced by the structure of epic and heroic poetry, saw fit to give to his plays. In both we find an exciting plot paralleled by an inner struggle; in both there are given to the hero superhuman proportions, the dramas being thus raised to a level above that of ordinary life. If the heroic tragedy, however, is in one way a development of earlier forms of tragic endeavour it is a development carried to excess. Dryden's plays bear the same relation to those of Shakespeare as a gramophone record bears to the voice of a celebrated singer. The tones are exaggerated and made harsh; there is the continual drone of unrefined harmonies; a lack of delicacy and of subtlety pervades the whole. Unquestionably Dryden realized the sphere of true tragedy; he had some conception of the genuine idée of this type of drama; but his age would not permit him to work that idée out in its correct forms. The consequence is that we can do little else now but smile good-humouredly at the more apparent follies of the type. The psychology, the language, the atmosphere, of this heroic drama are all foreign to us.

There is, moreover, one outstanding want in all Dryden's plays. That want is the lack of passion, or the lack of adequate treatment of passionate scenes. The reaction from the overstrained emotions of Ford's degenerate tragedies took the form of a complete overthrow of the world of passion. Just as the poets, in an endeavour to secure some saner utterance than was provided by the lesser metaphysical writers, turned to the heroic couplet and the realm of the intellect, so the dramatists endeavoured to escape the wilder sentiments of a Ford by adopting as their sphere common sense and reason. Tragedy, however, can rarely, if ever, be thus limited to an intellectual plane ; passion is its very life-force and innermost being ; nor was Dryden, reared on the poetry of the metaphysicals and of the pre-Restoration dramatists, entirely lacking in emotion. It is the emotion in him which makes him the greatest lyric-writer of his time ; it is an undercurrent of emotion which makes Mac Flecknoe and Absalom and Achitophel such perfect satires. For tragedy, on the other hand, such undercurrents of passion are not sufficient ; here a full abandon must be made to the sternest and most soul-embracing of emotions ; and that the common sense and reasonableness of the age would not permit. Dryden, therefore, is fettered. He cannot throw himself wholeheartedly into the passions he would depict for us, with the consequence that his emotional scenes are stilted and unnatural even beyond the jingling tones of the heroic rime. One example of this may be sufficient, an example which helps to display the immense chasm which divides the Elizabethan from the Restoration theatre. The supernatural had been treated by Shakespeare with a delicacy and a sureness of touch unknown before save in the dramas of classical Greece, and Shakespeare by his example had influenced many of his successors. Dryden too, in The Conquest of Granada, attempts a scene of like nature, but a comparison between the following lines and those which accompany the apparition of Hamlet's father will at once display how lamentably Dryden failed in calling forth the emotions of fear and wonder and awe.

BRITISH DRAMA

Almanzor. A hollow Wind comes whistling through that Door ;
And a cold Shiv'ring seizes me all o'er :
My Teeth, too, chatter with a sudden Fright :
These are the Raptures of too fierce Delight !
The Combat of the Tyrants, Hope and Fear ;
Which Hearts, for want of Field-room, cannot bear.
I grow impatient ; this, or that's the Room :
I'll meet her ; now, methinks, I hear her come.

THE HEROIC TRAGEDY

[He goes to the Door ; the Ghost of his Mother meets him.

He starts back : The Ghost stands in the Door.

Almanzor. Well may'st thou make thy Boast, whate'er thou art,

Thou art the first e'er made Almanzor start.

My Legs—

Shall bear me to thee in their own Despight :

I'll rush into the Covert of thy Night,

And pull thee backward by the Shrowd, to Light. }

Or else I'll squeeze thee, like a Bladder, there ;

And make thee groan thy self away to Air.

[The Ghost retires.

So, art thou gone ! Thou canst no Conquest boast ;

I thought what was the Courage of a Ghost.—

—The grudging of my Ague yet remains :

My Blood, like Isicles, hangs in my Veins,

And does not drop : Be Master of that Door,

We two will not disturb each other more.

I err'd a little, but Extreame may join ;

That Door was Hell's, but this is Heav'n's and mine !

[Goes to the other Door, and is met again by the Ghost.

Again ! by Heav'n I do conjure thee, speak.

What art thou, Spirit ? and what dost thou seek ?

[The Ghost comes on softly after the Conjunction ; and Almanzor retires to the middle of the Stage.

Ghost. I am the Ghost of her who gave thee Birth ;

The airy Shadow of her mould'ring Earth.

Love of thy Father me through Seas did guide ;

On Seas I bore thee, and on Seas I dy'd.

I dy'd ; and for my winding Sheet a Wave

I had ; and all the Ocean for my Grave.

But, when my Soul to Bliss did upward move,

I wander'd round the Chrystal Walls above ;

But found th' Eternal Fence so steeply high,

That, when I mounted to the middle Sky,

I flagg'd, and flutter'd down ; and could not fly. }

Then, from the Battlements of th' Heav'nly Tow'r,

A Watchman Angel bid me wait this Hour ;

And told me I had yet a Task assign'd,

To warn that little Pledge I left behind ;

And to divert him, ere it were too late,

From Crimes unknown, and Errors of his Fate.

Almanzor. Speak, Holy Shade ; thou Parent-form, speak on :

[Bowing.

Instruct thy Mortal Elemented Son ;

(For here I wander, to my self unknown.) }

BRITISH DRAMA

But O, thou better Part of Heav'nly Air,
Teach me, kind Spirit, (since I'm still thy Care)
My Parents Names :
If I have yet a Father, let me know,
To whole old Age my humble Youth must bow ;
And pay its Duty, if he Mortal be ;
Or Adoration, if a Mind, like thee.

The selection of such a passage as this for quotation must not, of course, be taken as implying that there is nothing of worth in the heroic drama. Speech after speech might be given to prove that Dryden was not only a master of language, but a poet and a true playwright. All that may be said is that the limitations of his age, themselves the consequences of romantic excess, prevented him from expressing to the full those ideas and those emotions which, had he been born forty years earlier, might have entitled him to rank among the greatest of the post-Shakespearians.

Alongside of Dryden roared and ranted a number of other heroic dramatists, most of whom are of little account. Elkanah Settle, with his wretched Cambyses, King of Persia (1671) and his not much finer The Empress of Morocco (1673), hardly deserves a better treatment than Dryden himself meted out to him. His plays evidently won a certain success in their own time, for the latter drama has the distinction of being the first fully illustrated play printed in England, but they possess nothing of Dryden's power of thought or of diction. John Crowne's work is almost equally negligible. The Destruction of Jerusalem by Titus Vespasian (1677) is his best work in this style, but even it seems dull and uninteresting when compared with The Conquest of Granada. Of all the rout of heroic rimesters barely three stand forward as possessing unquestioned value. Roger Boyle, Earl of Orrery, already mentioned as a predecessor of Dryden in this style, is in some ways the least of these. A certain strength he has, and a decided power of expressing his thoughts in a capable but not over-musical heroic verse. His claim to remembrance rests, however, not so much on these qualities as on some peculiar features of his themes and of the treatment of those themes. It is noticeable, in the first place, that Orrery's plays are modelled on a plan clearly distinct from that followed by his companion, Dryden. Dryden belongs to the regular line of native dramatic development. His plays are successors, if far-off successors, of the Shakespearian tragedy. Orrery is more deeply influenced by the rîméd tragedy of France. His atmosphere has a decided chill, an attempt at classical restraint, which marks him out as the follower of Corneille and Racine rather than of the Elizabethans. The peculiar fact is, however, that, deeply influenced as he was by French example, he went back in some of his plays to an earlier English dramatic tradition, lost in the post-Shakespearian period. If in The Tragedy of Mustapha, Son of Solymán the Magnificent (1665 ; printed 1668) and in Tryphon (1668 ; printed 1669) he adopted those Eastern themes so popular with the heroic writers, in The History of Henry the Fifth (1664 ; printed 1668) and in The Black Prince (1667 ; printed 1669) he took up the chronicle-history tradition abandoned by almost all dramatists in the Jacobean and Caroline periods. It is assuredly true that his treatment of these native historical themes is almost totally un-historical, and that it owes nothing to sixteenth-century example, yet the very fact that Orrery thought of English history at a time when men's minds were filled with grotesque visions of Peru and Persia and Egypt shows that he had a mind of his own, and his action must have had some influence upon later dramatists who turned once more for inspiration to the historical events of their native land. It must, of course, be confessed that Orrery had but small importance in his own time. Charles may have approved of his dramas, but his lack of stirring action, his chastened language, his efforts at restraint, were ill suited to compare favourably with the more exciting tragedies of Dryden. Orrery's influence came later, when pseudo-classicism brought calmness to the English theatre and when together with that pseudo-classic placidity a return was made to historical subject-matter.

THE HEROIC TRAGEDY

Of different importance is Nathaniel Lee, the Bedlamite. This man, who first appeared on the dramatic horizon in the full flush of heroicism with his Tragedy of Nero, Emperour of Rome (1674; printed 1675) and who continued to provide the theatre with rimed and blank-verse pieces until 1689, was one of those unhappy creatures who, born with an undue share of enthusiasm and passion into a world of intellect and reason, found relief only in madness. He is akin to Cowper and Smart and Blake, light flashing from his brain in lurid intervals, gleaming all the more brightly because of the surrounding gloom. The follies of Lee's rhapsodies for long obscured his real powers, but we now, in an age when dispassionate judgment is possible, can see beneath the absurdities of Sophonisba: or, Hannibal's Overthrow (1675; printed 1676), of Gloriana, or the Court of Augustus Cæsar (1676), and of Theodosius; or, The Force of Love (1680) elements which call for our whole-hearted praise. Lee possessed something of the mighty voice of the Elizabethans. His passion is infecting, rising as it does to the rich sweeping of tumultuous verse. He has little form in his dramas; every one of them lacks the finished care of a master, but if we may be permitted to judge of plays by individual scenes—always a dangerous course—we must accord him a high place among the dramatists who came between the age of Charles II and the age of Victoria.

BRITISH DRAMA

The only other heroic writer who calls for individual mention here is Thomas Otway, who, before he penned his two brilliant masterpieces, gave a rimed Alcibiades (1675) and Don Carlos, Prince of Spain (1676) to the theatre. Both are marked by surer touches than may be found anywhere in the period save in the plays of Dryden. Alcibiades has many foolish scenes, but even in it there is a strength of utterance hard to overlook. In Don Carlos we reach one of the most perfect of these heroic dramas. The theme has more reality than is usual in the type, and the passions are not exaggerated out of all likeness to human emotions. The conflict in the breast of the son is well developed, and Otway shows himself here, at the very opening of his career, and working in a peculiarly difficult and circumscribed dramatic sphere, as the master which he later proved himself conclusively to be in The Orphan ; or, The Unhappy Marriage (1680) and in Venice Preserv'd ; or, A Plot Discover'd (1682).

THE HEROIC TRAGEDY

(ii) BLANK-VERSE TRAGEDY

The mention of these two dramas brings us to an account of a dramatic development certainly influenced by, but distinct from, that of the heroic tragedy. This later dramatic development unquestionably was due to a new appreciation of Shakespeare. In 1677 Dryden wrote his All for Love in imitation of Shakespeare's style, and Otway produced, between his heroic plays and his two master-pieces, an adaptation of Romeo and Juliet as The History and Fall of Caius Marius (1679 ; printed 1680). It seems almost certain that a renewed acquaintanceship with Shakespeare's tragedies was thus partly responsible for the almost complete disappearance of the rimed drama after 1678 or 1679. Pseudo-classicism, rapidly growing in power, aided in curbing the excesses of the heroic playwrights, but to Shakespeare we must look first for the cause of the change. The Orphan is not precisely a Shakespearian drama, but it has something of that higher and nobler conception of tragedy which is associated with the early seventeenth century. The plot is well known ; how two brothers love one girl, how one of the brothers marries her secretly, and the other, thinking it all but a licentious assignation, anticipates his brother in the darkened room and brings tragedy to all three. The story is a poignant one, full of possibilities of which Otway has taken full advantage. There is here that mingling of human error with fatal purpose which marks out the greatest tragedy of all time. The two brothers and the unhappy Monimia seem, as it were, wrapped in the folds of some mysterious destiny ; their thoughts and actions are warped from their original intent ; and the tragedy consequently is more than a mere tale of human frailty. At the same time, it is the licentious passion of the one brother, and the innocent duplicity of the lovers, which immediately bring about the catastrophe. Only in one respect does Otway reduce this play to lower levels. His atmosphere, only too frequently, is that of pathos rather than tragic awe. The exciting of tears is his object rather than the conjuring forth of those deeper and richer emotions which leave us dry-eyed and aghast. In Otway's hands this element of pathos is not over-deeply stressed, but his example was destined to bring a sad array of lamentable and lachrymose dramas to the English stage. Venice Preserv'd has less of this element of pity. The theme is one of sterner emotions—the hard-hearted yet generous Pierre, the vacillating Jaffier, and the troubled Belvidera raising the drama above mere pathetic levels. Here perhaps the sense of fate is not so fully evident, although it is apparent in many scenes, but the psychological delineation of the characters is still more subtle and finely finished. The essential errors of these main figures are, too, well developed, and the tragedy seems to move forward logically toward its self-appointed end. Its only blemishes lie in the not wholly convincing madness of Belvidera in the final scene, and in the comic episodes, which, in spite of the defence of some modern critics, seem to destroy the general atmosphere of the drama.

BRITISH DRAMA

Of Otway's power there is no other dramatist of this age except Dryden, and even Dryden never succeeded in producing such a master-work as Venice Preserv'd. All for Love is his finest achievement, and this drama has less of the true tragic spirit than Otway's. The theme, as is well known, is that of Antony and Cleopatra, although there are few verbal reminiscences of Shakespeare's play. Dryden's aim has here been to fuse the more formal elements of the pseudo-classic theory with the richer proportions of the Elizabethan theatre. He has cut out the multiplicity of scene, which at once adds to and detracts from the force of Antony and Cleopatra, and he has reduced the feelings of the chief characters to such standards as his contemporaries could understand and appreciate. It is undeniable that he has lost all of that high ardour and passionate romance which breathes from every scene of Shakespeare's play, but it is equally undeniable that he has succeeded in giving to this theme a more coherent and formed treatment than is apparent in the earlier tragedy. All for Love in its own style, but only in its own style, is a drama worthy of being considered alongside of Antony and Cleopatra. Dryden's other tragedies have hardly the same strength and fervour. Amboyna (1673) is a crude tragedy written purely as a piece of propaganda against the Dutch; Troilus and Cressida, or, Truth found too late (1679) is merely a tragic treatment of Shakespeare's peculiar tragic-comedy; while Don Sebastian, King of Portugal (1689; printed 1690) and Cleomenes, the Spartan Heroe (1692) mark returns to heroic sentiments, even although these heroic sentiments are couched in blank verse instead of rime. Altogether Dryden's efforts in the realm of tragedy are disappointing. His best work was cast in the form of the heroic drama, a type of theatrical literature which was manifestly unsuitable for the enunciation of the loftiest and profoundest passions. The later dramas were written obviously for the sake of making money, and even All for Love shows the author too deeply fettered by the conditions under which it was written. This greatest of all the Restoration writers seemed to fail in the theatre. He had the dramatic sense developed to a high degree; but, in that age of conflicting ideals, Dryden never secured for himself a definite aim and a conscious purpose. His dramas at best lack true individuality.

THE HEROIC TRAGEDY

As tragedy developed after 1679 several marked tendencies become apparent, tendencies which are inherent in All for Love and The Orphan. The first is pseudo-classicism, leading toward strictness of form, including the retention of the three unities, and toward chill of dialogue and simplification of plot. The other, which takes diverse forms, is the movement toward pathos and pity. These two tendencies dominated practically the whole of tragic productivity from the last decades of the seventeenth century on to the latter part of the eighteenth. The pseudo-classical school, at least that part of the pseudo-classical school which held most strictly to the 'rules' of propriety and of good conduct, hardly obtained a secure footing in the seventeenth century itself, and even in the Augustan age proper (from the reign of Anne to the last quarter of the eighteenth century) pseudo-classicism in the theatre seems to have been rather an undesirable element. The regular pseudo-classical plays were duly mounted and revived, but none proved genuinely popular, unless we assume that the success of Addison's Cato (1714) was due entirely to its own merits, and had nothing in it savouring of political prejudice. If the more extreme pseudo-classicists, however, had little hold during the Restoration period, the rules so cherished by them penetrated through all the realms of drama and came to influence greatly both comedy and tragedy. The simplified form of the Antony and Cleopatra story found in All for Love is directly traceable to the influence of these pseudo-classical ideals. All attempts were made to avoid romantic profusion of material, and gradually, with this simplification, there disappeared that richness of passion, that excess of emotion, from which the romantic genius ultimately takes its rise.

BRITISH DRAMA

As a species of reaction to this, although frequently it took a course parallel to and even joined paths with the pseudo-classical movement, we find the development of pathetic and pitiful sentiments and scenes. This tendency has already become apparent in The Orphan, has been noted, indeed, several decades previously in some dramas of the period 1610-40. Now, however, it flourished most abundantly. Love and honour themes had probably led men to stress more deeply than in Elizabethan days the subject of amorous passion, so that by the end of the seventeenth century hardly any tragedy was penned which did not introduce as a main theme a tale of love, happy or disastrous. Inevitably this weakened the tone of late seventeenth-century tragedy. Instead of the vast, cataclysmic, elemental emotions, varied and diverse, which marked the tragedies of Shakespeare we find constant complaints and passages of amorous bombast which are difficult to read and in the sincerity of which we cannot believe. In accordance with this change of atmosphere went an alteration of tragic plan. In Elizabethan times tragedy had been predominatingly masculine; the hero formed the centre and keynote of the play; on him all attention was focused. With the entrance of love into the theatrical arena the heroine rapidly came to take a more prominent place. Her progress, however, was hindered in the days of pure heroics by the presence of martial prowess from which—for few heroines were Amazons—she was banished. The advent of pathos, on the other hand, distinctly favoured the heroine, who came more and more to usurp the prominent position, until toward the end of the century we reach the 'she-tragedy,' where the hero has almost completely vanished, and a woman figure dominates the entire action of the drama. This final culmination was not attained until the eighteenth century, when Rowe fully established the type, but the tendency can clearly be traced in the preceding decades. The most important predecessor of Rowe in this sphere was John Banks, who, starting with a couple of heroic dramas—The Rival Kings: or The Loves of Oroondates and Statira (1677) and The Destruction of Troy (1678; printed 1679)—passed from those to pen a series of pathetic plays on historical themes. The Unhappy Favourite: or The Earl of Essex (1681; printed 1682) was the first of these, followed by Vertue Betray'd: or, Anna Bullen (1682), The Island Queens: Or, The Death of Mary, Queen of Scotland (printed 1684), and The Innocent Usurper; or, The Death of the Lady Jane Gray (printed 1694). The titles of these tragedies clearly show their general scope. None is remarkable for great intrinsic excellence, although Banks was a more capable writer than is usually supposed, but their historical value is literally enormous. Several of these plays remained long on the stage; Rowe certainly was acquainted with them; so that Banks became one of the most powerful forces in the development of eighteenth-century tragedy. It is not too much to say that in several dramatic schools his influence, direct and indirect, for forty or fifty years after his death was second only to that of Shakespeare himself.

236

THE HEROIC TRAGEDY

BRITISH DRAMA

(iii) OPERA AND SPECTACLE

These heroic, pathetic, and other movements all combined with a general operatic tendency. Scenery had, as we have seen, come into general use in this period of the Restoration, and along with this advent of scenery we have noted the tendency toward exaggeration and artificiality of plot and character. The age still retained that enthusiasm for music which was so marked a feature of the Elizabethan period, and this enthusiasm for music added to the other movements indicated above readily made way for the elaboration of the opera. To trace this development accurately it is here necessary to return to the dramatic work of Sir William D'Avenant, who is one of the inaugurators both of the heroic tragedy and of the opera. It has been already noted that he was the only person authorized during the Commonwealth régime to arrange theatrical performances, and no doubt he was enabled to do so only by representing that his performances were not of plays, but of musical entertainments. The Siege of Rhodes (1656), along with The Cruelty of the Spaniards in Peru (1658) and The History of S^r Francis Drake (1658; printed 1659), was a musical entertainment of this sort, written in rime and designed, on the lines of Italian opera, to be sung in recitative and aria. As a play, The Siege of Rhodes had its influence upon Dryden and other masters of the heroic tragedy, but it is valuable besides that for its position in the development of English opera. The new scenes, the accompaniment of the orchestra, the pleasant airs, all attracted the attention of playgoers, and before a few decades had passed other writers were striving along the same path. The first approach toward the opera in the Restoration period proper was in the direction of Shakespearian adaptation. The Tempest, after a considerable amount of sophisticated alteration and addition, was made operatic by Dryden and Shadwell; Macbeth similarly was operatized by an unknown author, who has been conjecturally identified with D'Avenant. The adaptations proved popular, as is witnessed by the numerous references, scathing as well as flattering, to the new fashion. That popularity inevitably led toward the composition of original operas of an even more ornate cast. Dryden, always ready to adopt a current novelty likely of success, penned his Albion and Albanus (1685) and his King Arthur : or, The British Worthy (1692). D'Urfey, Settle, and others vied with one another in producing similar works, each more gorgeous and full of telling incidents and novelties than the last. These operas, it may be observed, were all on the English plan, and were commonly designated by the title 'dramatic' in contradistinction to the 'Italian' operas, to produce which in England attempts had already been made. The cardinal difference between the two types lies in the presence or absence of recitative. All the dialogue of the dramatic opera is spoken ; such operas are merely spectacular plays with many incidental songs and full accompaniments of instrumental music. The Italian operas, on the other hand, are designed wholly for singing, no spoken dialogue being permitted unless in some occasional scenes of a comic character. With the aid of Purcell the former type held the field all through the Restoration period, although a French opera in recitative was produced in London in the early seventies of the century ; but once the fashion for opera had fully established itself it was inevitable that efforts should be made to introduce on the London stage some of those productions which had charmed audiences in Rome, in Florence, and in Paris.

THE HEROIC TRAGEDY

These efforts culminated in the first years of the eighteenth century, and, although the account of them ought strictly to have been included in the following chapter of this book, it may be well to glance here at the early development of the Italian form. The approach was made at first through translation. Two theatrical workers, MacSwiny and Motteux, seem to have been chiefly instrumental in preparing for the stage the first two operas of this type, Arsinoe (1705) and Camilla (1706). The singers in these were all English, and the original music was adapted to the conditions under which the works were produced. Soon, however, it was found that the stock of English vocalists was limited ; every one praised the voices of Italy ; and accordingly high sums were offered by the managers to tempt away from the Continent a few of the more noted singers. Even yet the production of operas in the Italian tongue was delayed, the managers adopting the expedient of making the English singers perform in English and the Italians in Italian. The confusions and absurd situations which arose from this convention may be found chronicled satirically by Addison in several well-known Spectator papers. Such a compromise could not endure for long, so that we are not surprised to find within a few years the appearance of Italian operas in all their original glory. Once established upon the stage, these operas definitely held their position. Händel came to England and aided in arousing still more enthusiasm for the type ; hardly a year passed by without the production of several new works ; the Italian opera became the fashionable haunt of society, and in its own way aided in the weakening of native dramatic work.

BRITISH DRAMA

The advent of the Italian opera had several well-marked influences upon the English stage. The dramatic operas were rapidly cast into the background. The Tempest and The Prophetess still appeared every season at one or another theatre, but few new works of the same class were written. While the older successes still retained something of their charm, the form was clearly felt to be old-fashioned, and men, when they tried to write something which might rival the Italian works, penned their verses in recitative and aria. Beyond this, however, the new fashion placed its mark upon the age. The success of the opera-house frequently caused a corresponding failure of the other theatres. Upper-class society in the eighteenth century was often plagued with the curse of indigence, and the high prices charged for opera subscriptions left many without the means of patronizing regular plays. A new opera, too, took away a good part of the spectators from the ordinary theatres, so that the many complaints which were uttered against the novelty were not by any means ill founded.

On the dramatic literature both of the late seventeenth and of the eighteenth centuries this operatic furore had its marked influence. The spectacular features of these productions led managers to attempt the reproduction of some of the most startling effects in regular plays, led dramatists, too, to fill their comedies and farces with many more songs than had been normal in preceding years. The plays of D'Urfey are thus richly interlarded with numerous lyrics of a diverse character. The musical elements in these comedies, added to the general popularity of the opera, unquestionably laid the basis of that typical eighteenth-century dramatic development, the ballad-farce or the ballad-opera. It were proceeding too far ahead to enter into a discussion of The Beggar's Opera and of its successors in this chapter, but a true appreciation of Gay's efforts cannot be secured without a realization of the importance in those years of the Italian opera.

THE HEROIC TRAGEDY

CHAPTER III

COMEDY IN RESTORATION TIMES

COMEDIES OF HUMOURS AND OF INTRIGUE

THE heroic tragedy and the opera gave no great masterpiece to the theatre. Some features of beauty may be discovered in both, but there is to be found no single work of either kind capable of being placed alongside of The Orphan or of Venice Preserv'd. True creative power had left the realm of serious drama ; all that is new and invested with individuality of expression is to be sought for in the sphere of comedy. The reason for this is not far to seek. The age, as has been shown previously, had abandoned the ways of poetry and was searching for truth not in the world of the imagination, but in the world of common sense and reason. The rich music of the Elizabethan singers and the bizarre stanzas of the metaphysical poets were alike displaced in favour of the heroic couplet, a verse-form which demanded for its successful execution little beyond a good ear, a sense of proportion, and a vivid intellect. With the appearance of this reign of common sense, moreover, a new prose was discovered, a prose fitted for the enunciation of logical thoughts and witty fancies. More and more men turned to this prose for a medium in which to express their desires, so that comedy, that species of drama which alone permitted of prose dialogue, became the most typical form of theatrical literature, and, at the same time, the form most capable of expressing the very temper and spirit of the age. Beyond Otway the Restoration period could produce no tragic dramatist of the first rank ; but in comedy it nourished several of the greatest of English masters, who between them succeeded in making this one of the most notable eras in the history of the theatre.

It is this age which is associated with the rise and development of the comedy of manners, in the hands of Etherege, Wycherley, Congreve, Vanbrugh, and Farquhar ; but we must not forget, in any enthusiasm we may feel for these dramatists, that, after all, their works form but an infinitesimal portion of the many comedies produced during these years. None of the first three wrote more than four dramas each, and the latter two composed most of their plays in the eighteenth century. The comedy of manners, which they succeeded in establishing and which marks the acme of comedy in that age, did not by any means dominate the world of the theatre ; it was rivalled by many another form which proved as popular, if not more popular, with contemporary audiences.

COMEDY IN RESTORATION TIMES

Among these types the old comedy of humours took an important place. Jonson still held his position as chief of comic dramatists, and his intellectualism made full appeal to an age weary of degenerate imagination. There were some who placed him, because of his art, higher than Shakespeare ; and even Dryden, much as he revered the name of Shakespeare, did not dare to place the one above the other. The influence of Jonson on the period is two-fold. We find, in the first place, a number of comedies obviously modelled directly upon his style ; and, besides these, we discover many dramas which, while not pre-vaillingly Jonsonian in essence, betray clearly the influence of his work in dialogue, scene, or character. Even the masters of the comedies of manners frequently showed that they had learned part of their art at least from the early seventeenth-century playwright.

Of all the pure Jonsonians Thomas Shadwell is without doubt the chief. No man more insisted on Jonson's greatness ; no man attempted more to reproduce something of the atmosphere of Every Man in his Humour or of Bartholomew Fair. Shadwell has long been neglected. It is probable that his quarrel with Dryden proved fatal to him, and he has come down to us as an unmitigated fool who never even deviated into sense. That this is a false judgment will be admitted by anyone who has read any of Shadwell's work. The truth is that he was no mean descendant of Jonson. His style, certainly, is rough, lacking that refinement and careful polish which distinguishes the more masterly Augustan prose, but he had a true flair for the theatre, and a considerable skill in the depicting of humorous types. In some ways he is the truest mirror of the age that we possess. Congreve may show more brilliantly the fine wit of the time, but his very brilliance takes away from the reality of the portrait; Shadwell, rising to less exalted heights, displays more accurately the ordinary existence of his age. Starting with a decided success in The Sullen Lovers: Or, the Impertinents (1668) he continued a chequered career up to his death in 1692, his last play, The Volunteers: or The Stock Jobbers (1693), appearing just after his death. Shadwell's dramatic work is of various types, for he patronized opera, pastoral, and tragedy as well as his more favoured métier of comedy. In the comic sphere, moreover, he allowed, particularly in his later life, several elements unconnected with the Jonsonian style to enter in. There are in his works characteristics which have led Professor Saintsbury to claim for him the title of a father of the comedy of manners, and there are traceable likewise some sentimental touches which show that Shadwell felt the impress of the changing spirit of the age. Of his eighteen dramas three or four stand forward as deserving of more particular attention—the early Sullen Lovers, The Humorists (1670; printed 1671), Epsom Wells (1672; printed 1673), The Virtuoso (1676), The Squire of Alsatia (1688), and Bury Fair (1689). In each of these we meet with a lively story of contemporary life, a multitude of eccentric and extravagant humours, and a love-plot of none too pure a nature. It must be confessed that Shadwell's plays are somewhat vulgar, for he is too true a child of his time to be prurient or puritanical. There is not, however, in his works any objectionable suggestiveness. He is frank and outspoken, and whatever of vulgarity may offend us to-day is seen to be the result of a bluntness of expression rather than of a definitely vitiated taste. Shadwell's main defect arises from his over-slavish imitation of Jonson; never does he seem capable of throwing off the tyranny of his master and striking out on lines of his own. In thus servilely following the Elizabethan dramatist Shadwell was, perhaps, somewhat out of date. Very few besides himself, except one or two writers whose age rendered them more pre- than post-Restoration in temperament, deliberately adopted the humours style in all its original harshness.

BRITISH DRAMA

COMEDY IN RESTORATION TIMES

Of these writers Sir Robert Howard, brother-in-law of Dryden, is first in point of time. His one pure comedy, The Committee (1662; printed 1665), a moderately good-humoured attack upon Puritan hypocrisy, is a well-written and vivacious piece of work, with characters not too heavily exaggerated and containing one particularly popular figure in Teg, or Teague, a loyal Irish servant and ancestor of many similar types in later years. With Howard may be mentioned the rougher and more plebeian John Lacy, who in The Old Troop: or, Monsieur Raggou (c. 1665; printed 1672) contributed another anti-Puritan satire to the theatre. Besides this play Lacy has left us an adaptation of Shakespeare in Sauny the Scott: or, The Taming of the Shrew (1667; printed 1698), one of Molière in The Dumb Lady, or, The Farrier Made Physician (1669; printed 1672), and a more original work in Sir Hercules Buffoon, or, The Poetical Squire (1684). All of these are marked by the same features, a tendency to follow Jonson in the depicting of exaggerated humours, a certain roughness and vulgarity of texture, and a decided propensity toward farce. This last characteristic of Lacy's plays may be due to the fact that he himself was an actor, and consequently was fully alive to all the possibilities inherent in stage action for the summoning forth of laughter. A companion of Lacy in the fields of farcical humours is John Wilson, whose comedy of The Cheats (1662; printed 1664) has lately been rescued from the oblivion into which it fell in the nineteenth century. It has certainly an amusing plot and some fairly ludicrous dialogue, but it is marred, like most of these Jonsonian works, by coarseness and lack of delicacy in style and in treatment.

As has already been noted, these comedies of humours, even from the first, were by way of being a trifle out of date. The age had attained an added refinement in language and in outer culture, so that the temper of the Elizabethan period, more manly but less delicate, seemed almost 'Gothic' to the airy Cavaliers of the Stuart Court. Dryden consequently was acting more in accordance with the changing tendencies of the age when, in his comedies, he strove to unite the strength of Jonson, the courtly spirit of Beaumont and Fletcher, and the new air of intellectual wit. Had Dryden possessed more of the debonair, outwardly brilliant, but not necessarily profound, temperament of Etherege and of his successors he might have succeeded in founding the comedy of manners. As it is, his undercurrent of emotion, his lack of fine wit, his inability to throw himself completely into the thoughtless follies and amusements of his time, prevented him from capturing the precise note of the manners school. He stands as a link between the earlier and the later, incapable of casting off his enthusiasm for the Elizabethan drama, yet not content merely to reproduce, as Wilson and Lacy strove to do, the exact style of the earlier period. With The Wild Gallant (1663; printed 1669) Dryden commenced his theatrical career. This play is the nearest of all his comedies to previous models, the inspiration for it having been obviously derived from Jonson's dramas; but even here the Restoration author showed that he felt the needs of his own age. In painting the portraits of Lady Constant and Loveby he displayed clearly enough his consciousness that the Stuart society for whom he was writing demanded something more than the rough satire which Jonson had thrown into his early seventeenth-century plays. The Wild Gallant is not a good comedy, but it shows the main features of Dryden's style, features he was to delineate more perfectly in The Rival Ladies (1664) and in Secret Love, or The Maiden Queen (1667; printed 1668). Both of these last-mentioned plays are tragi-comedies in the sense that a wholly serious and almost heroic plot is paralleled by another theme as typically comic. It is the latter alone which concerns us here. In Secret Love Dryden reached the acme of his comic portraiture. Celadon and Florimel are well-nigh perfect presentations of those characters adumbrated in The Wild Gallant. The air of careless abandon, the hilarious wit, the setting free of all conventional restraint—all features of his earliest play—are here crystallized in the two figures which will always remain monuments of his power and genius. In those figures Dryden comes closest to the spirit of the Etheregian comedy. In his later life he attempted to reproduce his earlier successes. Wildblood and Jacintha in An Evening's Love, or the Mock Astrologer (1668; printed 1671), Palamede and Doralice in Marriage A-la-mode (1672; printed 1673), Ascanio and Hippolita in The Assignment; or, Love in a Nunnery (1672; printed 1673), Mercury and Phædra in Amphitryon: or, The Two Socia's (1690), all are copies of these originals and all, despite many variations and truly comic features, fail to secure the first gaiety and abandoned hilarity of Secret Love. In these plays Dryden shows plainly his position in the development of the comic theatre. He owes a debt to Jonson, chiefly in his minor characters, although in S^r Martin Mar-all, or the Feign'd Innocence (1667; printed 1668) he produced a play in which the principal characters are humours; he owes, too, a debt to Beaumont and Fletcher, his main plots being framed on the style of the comedy of intrigue; above all, he strikes out on a path of his own in striving to delineate something of the new spirit of the age. In thus fusing together many diverse elements Dryden did a great service to the English theatre, but the very fact that he did so has to a certain extent taken from his posthumous fame. His comedies, fine as they are and excellently fitted for stage representation, have not that individual flavour which is so noticeable in the works of Etherege and of Congreve. There is, too, one other thing which makes them less acceptable to modern readers. Congreve dwells almost wholly in the world of the intellect; his amours are not of passion, not of the heart, but of the head. Dryden, as has been noted, still retained something of the Elizabethan age in him, and as a consequence his scenes of licence may strike us as being often more immoral than similar scenes in the comedies of manners. This statement, of course, cannot be pressed too far, as many situations given by the dramatists of manners are as vulgar as anything in Dryden's works, but it seems that there is at least a modicum of truth in the assertion.

BRITISH DRAMA

COMEDY IN RESTORATION TIMES

BRITISH DRAMA

Few of the many other dramatists who patronized comedy during these years can be dealt with here. Most of the ordinary works written for the theatres are dull and uninteresting and demand no special attention. There are, however, a few particular writers who deserve at least brief mention. Of these Mrs Aphra Behn is the first. As Shadwell is the representative of the comedy of humours in this period, she is the chief representative of the pure comedy of intrigue. Her dramatic career started in 1670 with the appearance of a tragi-comedy, The Forc'd Marriage, or the Jealous Bridegroom, but her chief activities in later years were to be confined to the realms of comedy proper. Her most popular success was The Rover : Or, The Banish't Cavaliers (1677 ; second part 1680), but besides this she has several plays well worth reading, especially The Dutch Lover (1673), The Town-Fopp : or Sir Timothy Tawdrey (1676 ; printed 1677), Sir Patient Fancy (1678), and The City-Heiress : or, Sir Timothy Treat-all (1682). There is little of wit in any of these comedies, but there is an amount of intrigue cleverly worked out and a decided skill in comic portraiture. Vivacity is her chief merit ; a bustling movement dominates all her works. This species of comedy of intrigue, made popular by the Spanish tastes of the Court, was adopted by a few other writers, such as John Crowne in Sir Courtly Nice : or, It Cannot Be (1685), but it was not taken up again by any author with the same enthusiasm until the appearance of Mrs Centlivre in the eighteenth century.

Of little intrinsic importance, but of considerable historical value, two minor dramatists, Nahum Tate and Edward Ravenscroft, must now be considered. Both were varied playwrights, producing tragedies and tragi-comedies as well as purely comic works, but their merit lies almost wholly in the last-mentioned species. To them more than

DESIGN BY INIGO JONES FOR " NEPTUNE'S TRIUMPH "

248

*Copyright of His Grace the Duke of Devonshire
Photograph by the Victoria and Albert Museum*

COMEDY IN RESTORATION TIMES

to any others we owe the development and establishment of English farce. A Duke and No Duke (1684; printed 1685) and Cuckolds-Haven: or, an Alderman No Conjurer (1685) by Tate, and the series of lighter pieces by Ravenscroft starting with The Citizen turn'd Gentleman (1672) and ending with The Anatomist: or, the Sham Doctor (1697), provided the theatres with sufficient farcical comedies in the last two decades of the seventeenth century. In its initial stages the farce was not very original in theme and plan. The majority of Tate's and Ravenscroft's works are merely crude renderings of previous comedies. A Duke and No Duke is thus an adaptation of a comedy by Cockain, and Cuckolds-Haven of Jonson's Eastward Ho; The Citizen turn'd Gentleman is derived from Le bourgeois gentilhomme, and The Anatomist plainly shows its indebtedness to Molière. This development of farce, indeed, better than any other type of drama, shows the weakening taste of the age. The ordinary spectators were growing weary of even the fine forms of comedy. They were better pleased with the clownish antics of a popular comedian than with brilliant dialogue or subtle delineation of character; they desired their Molière and their Jonson in skeleton shape rather than clad in the living form with the full flush of vitality upon them.

This farcical strain, added to features of a spectacular and operatic kind, is to be found likewise in the plays of Thomas D'Urfey, a writer perhaps better known for his songs and shorter lyrics than for his dramatic work. D'Urfey is a more capable playwright than either Ravenscroft or Tate, but his plays are, like theirs, mainly adaptations of other works, or else patchworks of farcical scenes taken from diverse sources. Madam Fickle: or the Witty False One (1676; printed 1677), his first play, is thus merely a collection of incidents taken from at least four early seventeenth-century dramas, and the same is true of his next play, The Fool Turn'd Critick (1676; printed 1678). D'Urfey's works are numerous, but all have the same characteristics—a plentiful supply of theatrical wit, a large use of action for comic effect, a decided tendency to trust rather to previous plots than to original invention, and a considerable employment of spectacular and musical devices. It will be noted later that in his very last plays, written after 1688, there is traceable another element—the beginning of a sentimental note which was to become the predominant feature of a whole school of dramatic writing in the eighteenth century.

BRITISH DRAMA

(ii) THE COMEDY OF MANNERS

In thus dealing with the minor comic authors of the Restoration period we have to a certain extent outlined the background for a brief analysis of the comedy of manners. So far several main tendencies have become apparent—the comedy of humours, the comedy of intrigue, and farce. Besides these there has been indicated a tentative movement toward a newer style in the comedies written by Dryden. Farce, as is evident, is largely a degeneration of true comic elements, and of it the masters of the comedy of manners made no use; but humours and intrigue enter freely into their works. Above all, they elaborated that new note struck by Dryden, filling their plays with a careless, frank, and debonair wit which marks them out as the inaugurators of a new comic species. This comedy of manners is almost wholly intellectual, emotion entering in only with Wycherley to colour the hard, crisp repartee and continual flashing of verbal rapier-thrust. It is, also, wholly aristocratic, the manners displayed being not those of men in general (such as Jonson showed in his humours), but the affectations and cultured veneer of fine society. For these men a manner was not a trait native to an individual, but a quality acquired by him from social intercourse. This fine society, thus mirrored in the comedy of manners, as it was the society of Charles II's Court, was dilettante, careless, intent only on pleasure and amorous intrigue, so that the comedy which depicted it has an air of abandon and of immorality which is markedly different from the manlier temper of the Elizabethan stage. For this not too much blame may be cast upon it. Comedy, have said many critics from classical days to the time of Shakespeare, is above all other things a mirror of the age, and in displaying the life of their time Etherege and his followers were but adopting a sphere which had been occupied by many before them. If we condemn the society of the Restoration Court we need not thereby condemn the dramatists of that period ; their object was to display the fashionable life of their time, not to indicate the superior mental and moral qualities of a past age or to prophesy concerning the improvements of the future. On a first reading, therefore, these comedies of manners may strike many as being immoral and vulgar ; but for students of literature a true historical perspective must be gained. There are many characteristics of the Elizabethan period which now seem to us brutal and unrefined, but we do not cease to read Shakespeare because these are reflected in his plays. One of the greatest secrets of the study of literature is to regard individual works not in the light of present-day theories and of present-day beliefs, but in the spirit of the age in which they were produced. It would be almost as absurd to refuse to read Æschylus because he was a pagan as to refuse to read Etherege because he was a courtier of the age of Charles II. There are, certainly, passages in the comedies of manners which overstep all bounds of decency and of good taste, where the dramatists have gone beyond even the excesses of the society of their time, and such passages can now be relished by none save a deliberate lover of pornographic literature. Scenes of this kind, however, are on the whole rarer in the comedies of manners than in other species of comedy during this age, and the determined intellectualism of the writers takes away to a certain extent from the evil effect of the particular scenes.

COMEDY IN RESTORATION TIMES

As is well known, the first true representative of this style was the courtier Sir George Etherege, who in 1664 brought forward The Comical Revenge ; or, Love in a Tub, a kind of tragi-comedy, and followed that with She wou'd if she cou'd (1668), and The Man of Mode, or, S^r Fopling Flutter (1676). The first of these may be regarded as an experimental effort. In style it is somewhat similar to Dryden's Secret Love, many of the scenes being written in rimed couplets. With his second and third plays, however, Etherege moved boldly into the world he had created and established as his own. Both deal with real types of the Restoration period, the ideal of the age being set forth in the fine gentlemen and witty ladies, and satire entering in at contemporary follies such as are depicted in the person of Sir Fopling Flutter. Etherege's comedy is, according to modern standards, unquestionably immoral, and even Addison in the age of Queen Anne saw fit to castigate him for sundry lapses into indecency. On the other hand, it is a comedy of almost perfect artistry, and that artistry takes away from much of its evil tone. Etherege has not the finesse of Congreve; his style is harder and possesses greater strength; but in his own way he is Congreve's peer. If the one has greater brilliance of dialogue and a more variegated fancy, the other has a greater variety of incidents and a surer touch in realistic portraiture.

BRITISH DRAMA

The new form of comedy, after Etherege, was not adopted by any individual writer until the appearance of William Wycherley, although by the seventies of the century many other authors were displaying in isolated scenes and characters the impress of the Etheregian style. Wycherley's plays are four in number, Love in a Wood, or, St James's Park (1671; printed 1672), The Gentleman Dancing-Master (1672; printed 1673), The Country-Wife (1675), and The Plain-Dealer (1676; printed 1677). Of these four the first three are intimately related together as displaying features distinct from others shown in The Plain-Dealer. These first three are all almost entirely in the Etherege style, dealing with a world of fops and fools and gallants, revelling in the none too honest intrigues of the time and packed, as in the notorious 'China' scene in The Country-Wife, with innuendos. There can be no question but that Wycherley is indescribably vulgar, particularly when his scenes are translated to the stage. As reading plays they may not seem to have such a confirmed immoral tone as those of Etherege, but seen in the theatre their inherent vulgarity is fully brought out.¹ There is not in these plays the airy wit of Etherege, but in place thereof we meet with the masterly hand of a true playwright. All of Wycherley's comedies are excellently constructed, and his portraiture is subtle and delicate. There is a sure touch in his treatment of character and of scene which shows him to have had a true flair for the theatre.

COMEDY IN RESTORATION TIMES

As important documents in the history of drama, however, these three early plays fade into insignificance when set beside The Plain-Dealer. Here Wycherley separates himself from the regular course of the comedy of manners, for inherently he had not the airy, care-free spirit of its other exponents. A Puritan with the veneer of a Restoration gentleman he has been called, and the phrase seems accurately to indicate his general position in life. He adopted the current modes of contemporary society, but at moments the native self asserted itself in him, and he attacked those vices which he himself had displayed before in comic wise. The first three plays are not, as has often been made out, prevailingly satiric. If Wycherley shows vice in them he shows it for the purpose of raising laughter. The Plain-Dealer, on the other hand, is not mainly comic in spirit; its chief note is that of bitter and often indignant satire. Its atmosphere is that of the Puritan rather than that of the Restoration gentleman. Manly, the hero, is a portrait of strength designed in opposition to the weakened, degenerate, and often effeminate figures of the age. With The Plain-Dealer Wycherley secured his greatest triumph. The Restoration audiences did not shrink from satire; possibly they regarded it in the light of another thrill wherewith to amuse themselves still further. Wycherley accordingly was universally acclaimed even by those who through their own actions were among the most debauched companions of the dissolute Charles.

¹ I take the opportunity here of correcting an impression of The Country-Wife given in A History of Restoration Drama (p. 226). The recent production of that play by the Phoenix Society has caused me to reverse the judgment there given concerning the intellectualism of the work. Horner is a character who may be a facetious companion in the study, but certainly he makes an unpleasant figure upon the stage.

BRITISH DRAMA

Wycherley, said these men, had been sent to lash the crying age ; but the old intrigues, the old excesses, proceeded merrily along, unimpeded by the dramatist's suddenly awakened horror.

If Wycherley marks a certain breakaway from the typical manners comedy as established by Etherege, William Congreve takes it back once more to its original paths. Congreve has nothing of Wycherley's puritanical temper, and he has less of the fundamental strength of Etherege's manner ; his whole power is centred on an airiness of fancy and a delicacy of pointed style, not necessarily so dramatic as the style of his two predecessors, but eminently adapted to the expression of the conventional conversation of the fine society of his time. Four plays in all keep his name alive : The Old Batchelour (1693), The Double Dealer (1693 ; printed 1694), Love for Love (1695), and The Way of the World (1700). Of these The Double Dealer is almost a tragic-comedy, and does not possess the rich sparkle of the other three. With The Old Batchelor, however, a new note was struck, not completely an innovation, certainly, for it is but the atmosphere of Etherege transformed—something finer, more delicate, more scintillating than anything that had gone before. Many of the characters may be little else than humours, but that cannot blind us to the perfection of the prose dialogue and to the sheer brilliance of the scenes. There is not much skill in construction, but no one had ever produced such a comedy replete with all the raciness of cultured, easy, debonair conversation. The literary success of The Old Batchelor was surpassed in Congreve's third play, Love for Love, with which the seceded actors under Betterton opened at the theatre in Lincoln's Inn Fields. In some ways Love for Love is his best comedy. There is in it a deliberately developed plot ; the plot moves forward with a certainty which shows that its author had clear in his mind from the start the action of his work. The characters, too, are excellently delineated. Ben is a realistic study, and so is Miss Prue ; Mrs Frail and Mrs Foresight are subtly differentiated. At the same time, the comedy as a whole appears to lack any centralized purpose. At one moment we are in the world of artificiality, where social convention rules all, and manners reign ; at another we are faced with reality, reality which impresses us as being more crass and sometimes brutal because of the artificial world with which it is mingled. While, therefore, the plot of Love for Love is Congreve's triumph, while some of the characters are his best drawn, while, even, a few of the isolated bons mots are among the finest and rarest expressions of his almost unique genius, the comedy as a whole fails when placed in juxtaposition to The Way of the World. In The Way of the World there is no false note. Millamant sails gloriously through it all, affected and fascinating ; servants, fools, lovers, wits, all seem to take from her something of that air of modish triviality which belongs to the best scenes of the comedy of manners. We may condemn the realism of some of the character-portraits in this play ; we may say that the plot is no plot, only a mere series of often impossible incidents designed simply to afford the author opportunity for uttering his streams of conceited metaphors and bewildering flights of intellectual fancy ; but that can never prevent us from acknowledging The Way of the World as the most perfect example in English of a certain type of comic endeavour.

COMEDY IN RESTORATION TIMES

This was to be Congreve's last effort in the realm of comedy, and already there were gathering round him forces which were ultimately to destroy the fine fabric of this particular type. In 1698 Jeremy Collier startled actors, authors, and audiences with his Short View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the English Stage, a work which was destined to lead to a long pamphlet controversy between those who upheld the licence of the Restoration drama and those who for moral or religious reasons desired to reform or overthrow the stage. In many ways the attack was well founded, even although Collier's arguments verge often upon the ridiculous ; the truth that underlay his attack is made nowhere more apparent than in the replies of the poets arraigned at the bar of Nonconformist justice. Dryden, who had been specially singled out, magnanimously, as was his way, confessed his errors, and without whining for mercy expressed his sorrow that pen of his had been guilty of errors he fully appreciated; others, not willing to acknowledge faults in their writings, scribbled hasty replies, but had nothing better to urge than the sect to which Collier belonged and the trivialities of some of his arguments. His main contentions were allowed for the most part to remain unchallenged. This fierce diatribe of a misoscenic Nonconformist minister would in all probability have remained unnoticed—would have hung heavy on the bookseller's hands—had it not come at a critical moment. In a later chapter attention will be called to the incipient sentimentalism of the late seventeenth century, and that incipient sentimentalism expressed in the drama of the time but corresponds to a general movement in the social life of upper-class circles. James II, with his Catholic propensities, was driven from the throne, and William had come to England with none of the great love of pleasure which had characterized Charles II. At least, if he indulged in pleasure he threw over it a cloak of decency and substituted hypocrisy for frankness. Whether his example was followed by the public at large or not, the truth remains that after the decease of Charles a certain outward veneer of morality covered the excesses of society. Men's tongues became more circumspect, if their thoughts remained the same, and affected blushes took the place of the blunt sophistication of the ladies of previous days. Add to these facts that the middle classes, always with the remnants of Puritanism clinging about them, were assuming an ever greater part in the life of the age, their wealth conquering the erstwhile supercilious disdain of the aristocracy, and we must plainly see that a new age was being born.

BRITISH DRAMA

Everything conspired together, and the comedy of manners, licentious, vain, worldly, found itself attacked on all sides. The days of Congreve, the days of thoughtless, brilliant, careless wit, were over, and the old free grace was never completely to be recaptured. For a time the typical form of Restoration comedy strove to retain something of the old abandon, but it soon flickered out, its light completely dimmed by the rising radiance of sentimentalism, good and bad.

256

COMEDY IN RESTORATION TIMES

Among those who aided in keeping alive something of the spirit of the Congrevian comedy were George Farquhar and Sir John Vanbrugh, men whose careers stretched from a period contemporaneous with the Collier attack on to the middle of the reign of Queen Anne. Farquhar's first play, Love and a Bottle, was produced in 1699, his last, The Beaux Stratagem, in 1707; Vanbrugh's The Relapse: or, Virtue in Danger appeared in 1696, his last farces in the early years of the eighteenth century. The careers of both these men are alike, and, taken together, they prove the general trend of theatrical tastes. Both commenced in the seventeenth century with largely immoral comedies, full of wit and striving to capture the fine grace that had distinguished the Stuart Court; both, as they progressed, showed with frequent touches of satire and cynicism a descent to farce and sentimentalism. Not that the two had precisely similar natures. Farquhar is at one and the same time nearer to the spirit of Congreve and more foppish than Vanbrugh. He has, in The Constant Couple (1699), in The Inconstant (1702), and in The Beaux' Stratagem, caught something of the true manners style. His plots are more carefully elaborated than are those of Congreve, but he retains at least a reflection of the Congreve wit. In The Twin Rivals (1702) and in The Recruiting Officer (1706), on the other hand, he displays clearly the impress of the newer age. The first is deeply tinged with a hypocritical sentimentalism, and the second has a realistic touch quite alien to the comedy of manners. Vanbrugh is much more robust than Farquhar, but that robustness removes him from the ranks of Congreve and leads him to draw comedy down from the high levels it had held to the lower depths of farce. More than any other of the playwrights mentioned in this chapter he relies upon action for comic effect. The plots of his comedies are designed not, as Congreve's were, for the expression of fancies of the mind, but for the elaboration of comic situations independent of the dialogue of the play. This tendency in his art is not so noticeable in his early works, The Relapse, The Provok'd Wife (1697), and Æsop (1696-7), nor is it especially apparent in The Confederacy (1705) or in The Mistake (1705), but it is abundantly evident in Squire Trelooby, a farce executed by Vanbrugh, Congreve, and Walsh out of Molière's Monsieur de Pourceaugnac, and in The Country House (1704), another farce taken from Dancourt. Like Farquhar, also, Vanbrugh turned to a type of sentimentalism, evidently insincere, in The False Friend (1702). The truth is that men of Farquhar's and Vanbrugh's calibre did not know where to stand. They had lost freedom of action in the conflicting moods of the time. Spectators, perhaps, were just as pleasure-loving as they had been in the days of Charles II, but there were now societies for the reformation of manners, and statutes against oaths, and other dreadful things to be feared. The efforts in the older style were, therefore, bound to be only half-hearted, or, if indulged in boldly, were sure to be followed by a succeeding moment of painful reflection. The Restoration drama may be immoral and vulgar, but it possesses the divine gift of laughter, and that gift, because of the rising sentimental and moral movement, was destined for many years to disappear in favour of impossible disquisitions on human virtue, artificial sentimentalizings, and inordinate scenes of pathos and pity.

BRITISH DRAMA

PART IV

DRAMA IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

CHAPTER I

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE AUDIENCE

FUNDAMENTALLY the theatres and the stage methods in the eighteenth century were the same as those employed in the later Restoration period. Some innovations here and there may be discerned—new methods of staging, new lighting effects—but such in no wise call for detailed attention here. The only alteration which may perhaps demand passing mention is the tendency after the middle of the century to erect theatres of increasing capacity. This tendency, it is true, had been started far back in the midst of the reign of Charles II with the building of the massive Dorset Garden playhouse, and was continued by Vanbrugh in his ill-designed theatre in the Haymarket, but in those early years this was countered by two facts. The first is that such theatres did not suit the purpose for which they were built ; instead of bringing in more money to the patentees or managers (as from their additional seating accommodation was expected) they often gathered together barely such an audience as would pay for the music and the candles. The second is that alongside of these larger theatres smaller structures, and structures usually more favoured by the spectators, were continually springing up—the Little Theatre in the Haymarket, the Little Theatre in Lincoln's Inn Fields, the Little Theatre in Goodman's Fields. These smaller theatres kept alive the love of subtle acting and the love of good plays. Here the glorious line of our drama could well be displayed ; here Garrick and other actors only less famous made their débuts. With the Licensing Act of 1737, however, these lesser theatres were technically, if not practically, silenced, and the drama became centred in Drury Lane and in Covent Garden. As these underwent their Phoenix-like alterations they grew in size, until a time came when subtle acting was impossible, when the hero and the heroine had to roar to galleries far distant from them, when delicate comedy and awe-inspiring tragedy alike failed to appeal because of the very vastness of the playhouses. This tendency, it is true, affects more largely the early nineteenth-century drama than the drama of the eighteenth century, but the movements which led to it are already apparent in this period, and its evil effects are plainly visible in the last few decades, which synchronize with the seething of romantic sentiment and the outbreak of revolution in France.

BRITISH DRAMA

More important for our purpose is an examination of the typical audience of the time. It has already been noted that a change was coming over society in the latter years of the seventeenth century, a change which operated disastrously upon the fortunes of the comedy of manners. This change was fully established in the reigns of Anne and the Georges. Anne was not interested in the playhouses; the first of the Georges could not have understood a word had he gone to the theatre; and as a consequence the actors, in search of a patron, turned from the King to the public. No longer were they his Majesty's servants in anything but name. A monarch no longer moved in their ranks, granting them monetary rewards, providing them with raiment, suggesting themes to the dramatists. Performers and playwrights were, therefore, both thrown more upon the caprices of the public than ever they had been since Elizabethan times. The public, however, was not the public which had graced Shakespeare's stage; it was still composed largely of society and its servants. Lackeys filled the upper gallery—until, indeed, they were driven from that airy perch for sundry misdemeanours—ladies of Quality and their gallants flocked to the boxes, and critics and beaux thronged the pit. Yet we are no longer in Restoration times. For all that the audience seemed unchanged, a great alteration had taken place. Many of the aristocratic families, partly because of excesses in the time of the Merry Monarch, partly because of ill-advised expenditure of money in the troublous days which preceded the succession of Queen Anne, had grown impoverished and no longer hesitated to replenish their coffers by judicious alliances with the wealthier bourgeoisie. Tradesmen and aristocrats thus gradually came together, the one seeking distinction of birth, the other financial aid, so that there was no longer the usually strict cleavage which separated the Cavalier and the citizen under the Stuart régime. The theatre, as we have seen, was the plaything of society in the late seventeenth century, and now the tradesfolk, proud of their association with the highborn, came to attend this haunt of the People of Quality, possibly adopting most of the fashions and vices of these People of Quality, yet still retaining some of their inherited bourgeois and occasionally puritanical tenets and tastes. The union of these two forces led naturally toward a less homogeneous set of predilections than had distinguished the Restoration theatre. Society still enjoyed the licence of the comedy of manners; Shadwell, Dryden, Etherege, Wycherley, and Congreve, even Ravenscroft and Tate, were still enjoyed; but the newer elements in the audience also delighted in moralizations, in approaches toward sentimentalism, in scenes of pathos. For many decades the struggle went on silently between the forces of intellectual callousness and those of incipient humanitarianism, destroying, as is the way with such struggles, the free expression of both the one and the other, but by the sixties and the seventies of the century the battle was won, and victory passed to the side of the sentimental movement. The middle classes, without consciously striving toward it, had gained the mastery.

THE EIGHTEENTH-CENTURY AUDIENCE

In connexion with the external conditions of the theatre in this period another fact must be noted. The century was a century of great actors. Garrick and Mrs Siddons dominate them all, but beside those two are many only less gifted with genius than they. In this the eighteenth century was not strikingly different from the latter part of the seventeenth, when Betterton and Mrs Barry, Mohun and Kynaston, Hart and Nell Gwyn, each laid his or her impress upon the drama of the age ; but if we are to take it all in all the Augustan period is richer in this way than that which went before. The result is seen in the plays written for these actors and actresses. The heavy style of performance which characterized the stage previous to the Garrick era eminently fitted the Booths and Barrys of the time to interpret the equally heavy pseudo-classical tragedy ; the airy modishness of a Mrs Oldfield was excellently fitted to express the tones of the ' genteel ' comedy ; Garrick's powers passed off on his audiences many a dull tragedy and duller comedy, even if at times they inspired a dramatist of talent to write something for him of true value. We can find only praise for the actors on account of their histrionic talents, but we may now censure them for their lack of discrimination and for their love of the effective part rather than of the artistic drama as a whole.

BRITISH DRAMA

CHAPTER II

PSEUDO-CLASSIC AND PATHETIC TRAGEDY

FUNDAMENTALLY, of course, there is no direct break between the Restoration and the Augustan periods. The one merges imperceptibly into the other, and no strict lines of demarcation are anywhere discoverable. At the same time, society and tastes were changing, and the year 1700 forms as convenient a point from which to trace the alteration as any. In the realm of tragedy the eighteenth century inherited three or four traditions—that which may be styled heroic, that which led toward renewed appreciation of Shakespeare, the pathetic note (often in the form of English historical plays) as expressed by Banks and Otway, and the gradual development of pseudo-classical theory and practice. Of these, in the seventeenth century, the last-mentioned was infinitely the weakest. All the more chill pseudo-classical dramas written and produced before 1700 were unsuccessful; audiences still admired the bombast of Dryden, the pathos of Otway, the natural warmth of the Shakespearian style. With the eighteenth century, however, pseudo-classical theory became more and more predominant. Addison, Pope, Steele, and a host of lesser men, including Dennis and Gildon, more noted in their own day than in ours, aided in establishing firmly that strict set of laws which bound poetry for well over half a century and which still exercised its influence in the days of Byron. According to these rules imitation of the ‘Ancients’ was the best that a modern author could do. His plays must be irreproachable as regards the three unities of time, place, and action. He must not permit more than a certain number of characters to appear in his work. He must, above all, endeavour always to secure decency, propriety, order, and common sense. Intellectual precision rather than passionate rhapsody must be aimed at. These rules dominated almost all the poetic and dramatic activity of the reigns of Anne and the early Georges, but dominated it as a force from without. Some writers may have found the pseudo-classic theory well to their tastes, but the spectators looked for something more inspiring, something more bombastic, than they could discover in the chill of the classical tragedy. We find, therefore, in this period a constant struggle proceeding between the pseudo-classicists and those who preferred other styles. The heroic tragedy still exercised its charm for the audience ; imitations of Shakespeare are constantly making their appearance ; Otway ruled over a large body of dramatists and of spectators. The lack of a central purpose, however, told heavily on the fortunes of the stage. Few playwrights seemed to know their own aims, and the majority compromised by observing the unities, filling their plays with pathos, and adding a seasoning of heroic ardour and of Shakespearian reminiscence. The result, as might be imagined, is a mass of uninteresting dramas unrelieved by any true features or marks of genius.

BRITISH DRAMA

It was not for want of courage or for want of patience that the pseudo-classicists failed to reform entirely the tastes of their age. Again and again they returned to the attack, but few were successful in their endeavours. In the early years of the century Dennis and Gildon made serious attempts to enlist favour on their side, and failed ; so did Dr Johnson in his Irene (1749), and managed to secure some small applause for his effort only through the good services of his erstwhile pupil, David Garrick. Barely three or four of these dramas were popular, and all lack true interest and tragic fervour. The first which definitely established itself upon the stage was The Distrest Mother (1712), written by Ambrose Philips, Pope's rival in pastoral poetry. This play was an adaptation from Racine, and contains not only some striking lines, but also two well-drawn characters. It is, however, an alien growth ; nothing of Elizabethan fire breathes in it, and the chill which envelops its dialogue owes its misplaced dignity to France.

PSEUDO-CLASSIC & PATHETIC TRAGEDY

The year following the appearance of The Distrest Mother Joseph Addison, already placed in his niche of fame, brought out at Drury Lane his famous Cato, a play which was at once accepted as a masterpiece by his friends and pseudo-classic followers. Its initial success was due partly to political enthusiasm, but its own merits established it as a stock play. We may confess that the enthusiasm meted out to Cato was not ill placed. If any pseudo-classic tragedy deserved the title of great, certainly Cato deserved it. What could be done in this style Addison has done ; and our only legitimate criticism may be directed to the limitations of the style. Instead of foolishly making a love theme the centre of an intellectual drama, as so many of his predecessors had done, Addison boldly took as his hero the philosopher Cato, endeavouring to display through an intellectual medium the working of his mind. Love he flung in as a kind of bait to the public, but kept scenes of this nature in the background. In doing so he pointed to the great defect of the tragedy of its time. No play to his age had seemed permissible which did not keep a loving hero and a faithful heroine always in the midst of the action, and the follies resultant upon an unimpassioned treatment of would-be majestic passion brought almost all these plays down to the level of the ridiculous. Addison alone dared to come forward with a theme eminently suited to the restricted medium in which he worked.

Many followed the author of The Spectator in choosing subject-matter from classical legend or history, but few realized the reason of his success. All filled their dramas with love, introducing weeping Andromaches and dismal Hecubas. In the middle of the century it seemed for a moment as if this style was to receive a fresh impetus when James Thomson, author of The Seasons, turned to the tragic stage. His Sophonisba appeared in 1730, and was followed by Agamemnon (1738), Edward and Eleanora (printed 1739), Tancred and Sigismunda (1745), and Coriolanus (1749). Three of these plays, it will be noted, had classical themes, and all three are treated in the pseudo-classic manner. In the first Thomson, probably realizing, as Addison did, the requirements of his style, turned Sophonisba from a lover into a patriot. Her associations with her adorers are dominated entirely by her desire to benefit her native land, and there is as a consequence decidedly less of the amatory sentiment than in other plays of the time. Agamemnon follows a similar plan, and achieves a certain dignity from the portrait of the title-rôle. Coriolanus is less interesting, and displays lamentably Thomson's weakness when contrasted with the majestic passion of Shakespeare. The two romantically themed plays call now for our attention. Both are dealt with in the ordinary pseudo-classic manner, but both treat of subjects which are startlingly different from the typical themes of other classical plays. It is possible here that we can trace the dissatisfaction of the poet at his own chosen métier. The author of The Seasons is now acclaimed as one of the forerunners of the romantic movement, and here in the theatre he shows himself, if half-heartedly, animated by themes taken from the dim 'Gothic' Middle Ages.

BRITISH DRAMA

After the middle of the eighteenth century the pseudo-classic tragedy dragged along miserably enough. No one masterpiece of this style during those years may be discovered, and soon the type was to be overwhelmed by the onrush of spectacular melodrama more suited, because of its flagrant rant, to the tastes of a people already feeling that stirring of revolutionary sentiment which produced here a Wordsworth and a Shelley, and in France a Robespierre and a Napoleon.

With the pseudo-classic tragedy, however, moved the heroic and pathetic types. Heroism dominated a great part of the ordinary tragic fare of the period. Even Gildon, pseudo-classicist as he was, could strive to emulate Dryden in his most bombastic flights. No one, on the other hand, wrote a really good heroic play in this period. Dr Joseph Trapp's Abra-Mule: Or, Love and Empire (1704) perhaps deserves some praise, but the characters are hopelessly stereotyped, and the language rarely rises above mediocrity. Benjamin Martyn's Timoleon (1730) has likewise a certain strength, and David Mallet's Eurydice (1731) and Mustapha

PSEUDO-CLASSIC & PATHETIC TRAGEDY

(1739) merit some praise for occasional scenes. The type is common, but because of its uninspired character cannot be given here anything but a passing mention. It were mere waste of space in a book of this kind to attempt an analysis of plays which were, after all, merely ephemeral and which now can charm no more.

The pathetic school, on the contrary, has a certain interest, in that there were several dramatists who succeeded in producing plays which, if not for all time, have yet a decided strength and an occasional beauty. To this school belongs Nicholas Rowe, the follower of Banks and Otway and the predecessor of George Lillo. Rowe's plays may betray features which link them with the heroic dramas of his own time and earlier ; occasionally may be traced in them elements plainly derived from pseudo-classic theory ; but fundamentally they belong to the type where pity is what the dramatist most seeks to evoke from the breasts of his hearers. Rowe's very first play, The Ambitious Step-Mother (1700 ; printed 1701), proves the author's predilections. In it Otway is praised and followed, and there is even a bold attempt, in order to secure greater pathos, to throw off the trammels of the pseudo-classic rule of Poetic Justice. This tragedy, which itself is not notable for any great excellence, was followed by Tamerlane (1701 ; printed 1702), a more heroic work, but in his third play, The Fair Penitent (1703), he found his true utterance. This tragedy, together with The Tragedy of Jane Shore (1714) and The Tragedy of Lady Jane Grey (1715), fully established Rowe at the head of Augustan dramatists. Each is a 'she-tragedy,' a heroine assuming chief place in the action ; each aims at the arousing of pity by means of many pathetic scenes. The style, of course, was not entirely novel. The first of the three plays is derived from Massinger's The Fatal Dowry, and already Banks had dealt with English historical themes in a very similar way. To Rowe, however, must be given the credit of having popularized the species. By his skill in contriving pitiful situations, by his gift for writing pleasant if not over-powerful blank verse, by his capable portraiture, he seized upon the minds and hearts of his contemporaries. His tragedies are not great, lacking as they do a central aim and homogeneity of tone, but they are among the best tragedies written for over fifty or sixty years.

BRITISH DRAMA

The selection of English historical themes gave an impetus to a species of drama, sometimes with Shakespearian echoes, but based fundamentally upon Otway, in the succeeding years. Mrs Haywood attempted a tragedy on the subject of Frederick, Duke of Brunswick-Lunenburgh (1729), and Ambrose Philips wrote The Briton (1722) and Humfrey, Duke of Gloucester (1723) on early English themes; so another writer, Captain William Phillips, turned to Irish history in Hibernia Freed (1722), and Smollett to Scots history in The Regicide (1749). Aaron Hill followed the fashion in Elfrid: or the Fair Inconstant (1710) and in King Henry the Fifth. Or, The Conquest of France by the English (1723), as did Henry Brooke in Gustavus Vasa (1739), William Havard in King Charles the First (1737), William Shirley in Edward the Black Prince: or, The Battle of Poitiers (1750), and John St John in Mary Queen of Scots (1789). It is possible that in choosing these subjects the dramatists were actuated by a number of diverse motives. The age was more patriotic than had been that of the Restoration, and these historical themes fired men's imaginations. The pseudo-classicists, too, had decided that it was better to dramatize actual fact than to attempt the weaving of a fictitious tale, so that in one way the playwrights were placating the critics. Shakespeare, who was now rising into renewed fame, came to be respected for his series of chronicle histories and seemed to unite with Banks and Rowe in favouring the species. Everything conspired to make this a popular type, and audiences liked it because it usually demanded in treatment an amount of bustle and action prohibited to the pseudo-classic muse. Not any of these playwrights were masters in the sphere of tragedy, but each displays certain features which prove that this type aided in keeping alive something of true tragic spirit at a time when the pseudo-classicists were endeavouring by every means in their power to destroy the very being of tragedy.

CHAPTER III

THE BALLAD-OPERA AND PANTOMIME

THE spectacular and operatic tendencies in the Restoration period have already been briefly noted, and a glance has been cast at the development of the Italian opera in the eighteenth century itself. This spectacular and operatic movement may seem somewhat at variance with the chastening influences dealt with summarily in the preceding chapter ; but it is to be interpreted as the expression of popular taste moving against the restrictions of the severer among the poets and critics. The men and women of the time obviously liked show ; music appealed to them, and dancing. After listening in bored silence to the ceaseless drone of the heavier tragedy they flocked for recreation to the opera, or applauded vigorously the singers, instrumentalists, and dancers who gave intermezzi before and after, and occasionally in the midst of, regular performances in the theatres. To appreciate aright the theatrical movements of the age the opera must be intimately related to the chiller forms of tragedy, and out of the two a picture of the period must be wrought.

Four popular species of entertainment must here be noted—the operatic, the spectacular, the terpsichorean, and the mimic. The first two have already been analysed ; only the latter two require comment. From the earliest Restoration days (and even in Elizabethan times) dancing formed a popular part of dramatic performances. Many plays ended with a dance, and we know how such a performer as Moll Davis charmed her public. To satisfy the craving for these dances theatrical managers in the late seventeenth century called in the services of dancing-masters from Paris, and these dancing-masters soon became a recognized feature of the theatres. We learn the names of many of them from the newspaper advertisements of the early eighteenth century, and we note, from the prominence given to them there, what a position they occupied in the minds of the spectators. At first their performances were limited to the ordinary dances of the Court or of the country, but soon came in the taste for mimic dancing, where a story was told silently by means of expressive movements. It is here we reach the beginnings of the pantomime; but the pantomime proper was based, not only on the dance, but on the commedia dell'arte. For many seasons during the first half of the eighteenth century French and Italian companies performed in London, drawing to their little theatre fashionable or would-be fashionable crowds. The répertoires of these companies consisted of an admixture of classical pieces and of lighter forms of drama. Many of the latter were harlequinades, introducing the recognized characters of the Italian improvised comedy. These characters soon occupied the attention of the audiences, and it is not surprising to find that the managers attempted to counter their rivals by introducing a form of entertainment well calculated to prove attractive. This form of entertainment was the pantomime. In its typical eighteenth-century shape the pantomime presented a union of diverse forces. In the first place, there was usually a serious legendary story told by means of dancing and songs—in fact a short opera on a usual operatic theme. In these plots moved the figures of the commedia dell'arte, burlesquing in silent movement the action of the more serious tale. All of this was laid upon a background of the most spectacular description, with the lavish use of 'machinery' and countless changes of scene to please the ravished spectators. It was impossible but that the pantomime, thus wrought out of all the audience held most dear, should prove popular. The two licensed theatres vied with one another in these shows, and soon they drifted to the lesser playhouses at Goodman's Fields and the Haymarket, and settled down comfortably at the various 'Wells.'

BRITISH DRAMA

These pantomimes did not by any means drive legitimate drama from the stage, for they were, for the most part, performed along with, not instead of, the regular comedies and tragedies ; but they had several serious effects upon the theatrical history of the period. In the first place, they aided in helping forward the disintegration of true dramatic taste ; unquestionably they lowered the general power of appreciation on the part of the audience. Secondly, they established fully the reign of the afterpiece. The afterpiece, as we have noted, was inaugurated in England with the appearance of Otway's The Cheats of Scapin, and in the first years of the eighteenth century it was fairly common for a tragedy or a comedy to be given along with a one-act farce. Still, the appearance of these farces was only sporadic ; they were not rendered necessary appendages to the ordinary plays. With the success of the pantomime, however, the public came to demand some light refreshment when the heavier meal of tragedy or sentimental comedy was over, and, if a pantomime was not shown, some short ballad-opera or farce was positively called for. There seemed nothing extraordinary to the audience in their listening to Lear's agony at 7.30 and laughing hilariously at pantomime or farcical afterpiece at 8. But there was a further result. The pantomime not only aided in the degeneration of taste and in the establishment of the afterpiece, but it led dramatists who might otherwise have contributed serious work to the theatre to indulge in the lesser forms of dramatic endeavour. A one-act farce paid better than a full-length tragedy ; the trivial words for an operatic pantomime were well rewarded. Farce, then, comes to occupy the minds of the playwrights, and many men, such as Lewis Theobald, editor of Shakespeare and capable scholar, turned to pen the foolish ditties which pleased the spectators in the pantomimic displays.

THE BALLAD-OPERA & PANTOMIME

The reign of pantomime is ultimately associated with the reign of the ballad-opera, and that there is an intimate relationship between the two has been demonstrated above. In origin the ballad-opera—or ballad-farce, as it was frequently called—was at once a burlesque and a rival of the Italian opera. It was aimed in the first place to capture some of the attention paid to the Italian type, but it employed for effect many satirical attacks upon the follies that were inherent in that form. Nor would the ballad-opera itself have come into being had not the ground been prepared by the other musical enthusiasts. Men now loved to hear a story sung, and they were delighted when they heard their favourite ditties as well as airs from popular Italian operas provided with new and witty words and all run together into a plot which (being told in English) they could understand and (being comic) they could enjoy.

BRITISH DRAMA

As is well known, the ballad-opera was invented by John Gay, whose The Beggar's Opera (1728) was the first of a long line of similar works stretching down to comparatively recent times. The Beggar's Opera at once intrigued the whole of London playgoers. The political references amused those many men and women tired of the chicanery of the Walpole régime; the gallant highwayman Macheath, the pathetic Polly, the farcical array of the hero's innumerable wives, the artificiality and fancy and novel daring of it, all ensured it what few innovations receive—an immediate popularity. All the town flocked to the little theatre in which it was performed; it was taken thence to the patent houses and to the booths; travelled from there through all the provinces; and even crept over to the Continent, where its half-concealed revolutionary tone secured it a hearing. Although Gay himself had not previously tried anything in the style of the operatic farce, he had made approaches toward the type in his "tragicomical farce" The Mohocks (printed 1712), a satirical piece, and in the peculiar play entitled The What D'ye Call It (1715), a work which approaches the sentimental in some portions and the intellectually satirical in others. The ballad-opera, however, far exceeded these in popularity and was at once imitated by others. Its author, eager, no doubt, to make even more money than had come to him from his first success, hurriedly prepared a sequel in Polly (printed 1729). The authorities were by now on the look-out. They had not dared to stifle the successful Beggar's Opera, but they saw, or they pretended to see, mighty signs of revolutionary ardour in the sequel. Polly was accordingly prohibited the stage, and was performed for the first time many years later, under Colman's management, in 1777. Polly is not nearly so fine as the first piece; it has a realistic touch lacking in the earlier play, which was so purely fanciful and wayward; the savages, too, strike a false note, and, although interesting enough as showing the Rousseauesque tendencies of the writer, aid in spoiling the work as a whole. After this set-back Gay attempted only one other play in the like style, Achilles (1733), which departs from the bantering political satire of The Beggar's Opera to burlesque a classical story. Its humour is not great, and it proved a failure on the stage.

THE BALLAD-OPERA & PANTOMIME

It is impossible here even to enumerate a moiety of the many ballad-operas produced between 1728 and the middle of the century. One after another they were rushed forward by authors eager to rival Gay in his newly won popularity and affluence, many of them meeting a well-merited fate at the hands of critical audiences. Of all the authors who adopted the style Henry Fielding is the one who calls for most detailed attention. This littérateur, anxious to earn money, had produced his first play, Love in Several Masques (1728), contemporaneously with Gay's successful opera, and it may have been partly the triumph of that satirical work which led him in 1730 to bring forward his burlesque tragedy Tom Thumb, later reworked and renamed The Tragedy of Tragedies. This piece follows the lines laid down in The Rehearsal. It attacks contemporary tragic follies, endeavouring to display the weakness of invention, the staleness of language, the stereotyped characters which marred the tragedy of the age. Along with The Rehearsal and Sheridan's The Critic this stands out as one of the best burlesques in English, the styles of the various authors being aptly ridiculed and the wit being in Fielding's finest satirical vein. While it has nothing to do directly with the ballad-opera, it may not be unfitting here to indicate briefly the scope of this burlesque movement in the eighteenth century. Fielding himself, inspired partly by the success of Tom Thumb, partly by his own satirical qualities, tried the form several times before the close of his dramatic career. The Covent-Garden Tragedy

BRITISH DRAMA

(1732) is in the same style, as are Pasquin (1736), Tumble-Down Dick: or, Phaeton in the Suds (1736), and The Historical Register, For the Year 1736 (1737). None of these save Pasquin possesses the wit that is apparent in his first burlesque, but each shows Fielding's abundant sense of the follies and evils of his time. The following quotation from the last-mentioned play illustrates well the author's view of those "entertainments" which have occupied our attention immediately above. Sneerwell, the critic, is discussing with Fustian, the tragic poet, the parts of the latter's play. Says Fustian, watching his battle upon the stage:

There, there, pretty well; I think, Mr Sneerwell, we have made a shift to make out a good sort of a Battle at last.

Sneer. Indeed I cannot say I ever saw a better.—

Fust. You don't seem, Mr Sneerwell, to relish this Battle greatly.

Sneer. I cannot profess my self the greatest Admirer of this part of Tragedy; and I own my Imagination can better conceive the Idea of a Battle from a skilful Relation of it, than from such a Representation; for my Mind is not able to enlarge the Stage into a vast Plain, nor multiply half a Score into several Thousands.

Fust. Oh! your humble Servant; but if we write to please you, and half a dozen others, who will pay the Charges of the House? Sir, if the Audience will be contented with a Battle or two, instead of all the Raree-fine Shows exhibited to them in what they call Entertainments.

Sneer. Pray, Mr Fustian, how came they to give the Name of Entertainments to their Pantomimical Farces?

Fust. Faith, Sir, out of their peculiar Modesty; intimating that after the Audience have been tired with the dull Works of Shakespeare, Johnson, Vanbrugh, and others, they are to be entertain'd with one of these Pantomimes, of which the Master of the Play-House, two or three Painters, and half a Score Dancing-Masters are the Compilers: What these Entertainments are, I need not inform you who have seen 'em; but I have often wond'ered how it was possible for any Creature of human Understanding, after having been diverted for three Hours with the Productions of a great Genius, to sit for three more, and see a Set of People running about the Stage after one another, without speaking one Syllable, and playing several Juggling Tricks, which are done at Fawks's after a much better manner; and for this, Sir, the Town does not only pay additional Prices, but lose several fine Parts of their best Authors, which are cut out to make room for the said Farces.

THE BALLAD-OPERA & PANTOMIME

Sneer. It's very true, and I have heard a hundred say the same thing, who never fail'd being present at them.

Fust. And while that happens they will force any Entertainment upon the Town they please, in spite of its Teeth [Ghost of Common-Sense rises.] Oons, and the Devil, Madam! What's the meaning of this? You have left out a Scene; was ever such an Absurdity, as for your Ghost to appear before you are kill'd.

Ghost. I ask Pardon, Sir, in the Hurry of the Battle I forgot to come and kill my self.

Fust. Well, let me wipe the Flower¹ off your Face then; and now if you please Rehearse the Scene; take care you don't make this Mistake any more tho'; for it would inevitably damn the Play, if you should. Go to the Corner of the Scene, and come in as if you had lost the Battle.

*Q.C.S.*² Behold the Ghost of Common-Sense appears.

Fust. 'Sdeath, Madam, I tell you you are no Ghost, You are not kill'd.

Q.C.S. Deserted and forlorn, where shall I fly?
The Battle's lost, and so are all my Friends.

Enter a Poet.

Poet. Madam, not so, still have you one Friend left.

Q.C.S. Why, what art thou?

Poet. Madam, I am a Poet.

Q.C.S. Whoe'er thou art, if thou'rt a Friend to Misery, Know Common-Sense disclaims thee.

Poet. I have been damn'd
Because I was your Foe, and yet I still Court'd your Friendship with my utmost Art.

Q.C.S. Fool, thou wert damn'd because thou didst pretend Thy self my Friend; for hadst thou boldly dar'd, Like Hurlothrombo,³ to deny me quite;
Or like an Opera or Pantomime,
Profest the Cause of Ignorance in publick,
Thou might'st have met with thy desir'd Success;
But Men can't bear even a Pretence to Me.

Poet. Then take a Ticket for my Benefit Night.

Q.C.S. I will do more, for Common-Sense will stay
Quite from your House, so may you not be damn'd.

Poet. Ha! Say'st thou? By my Soul a better Play
Ne'er came upon a Stage; but since you dare
Contemn me thus, I'll dedicate my Play
To Ignorance, and call her Common-Sense;
Yes, I will dress her in your Pomp, and swear
That Ignorance knows more than all the World.

¹ flour.

² Queen Common-Sense.

³ A fantastic piece by Samuel Johnson of Cheshire.

BRITISH DRAMA

No better commentary than this could be found on the typical theatrical affairs of the time, for, deeply satirical as it is, it bears behind it the weight of truth.

The burlesque form, partly because of Fielding's own endeavours, proved highly popular in the middle of the eighteenth century, but few of the pieces rise above mediocrity. One of the best of the early examples is Henry Carey's The Tragedy of Chrononhotonthologos: Being the most Tragical Tragedy, that ever was Tragediz'd by any Company of Tragedians (1734) with its famous first lines:

SCENE, An Antichamber in the Palace:

Enter RIGDUM-FUNNIDOS, and ALDIBORONTIPHOSCOPHORNIO.

Rigdum-Funnidos. Aldiborontiphoscophornio!
Where left you Chrononhotonthologos?

This, however, is a short piece, and indulges not in witty satire, but in burlesque exaggeration. Much finer is R. B. Sheridan's The Critic or A Tragedy Rehearsed (1781), which contains the well-known character of Puff, who has reduced the gentle art of advertisement to regular rule and scientific method. To Sneer, who questions him on the point, he cries:

O lud, Sir! you are very ignorant, I am afraid.—Yes Sir,—PUFFING is of various sorts—the principal are, The PUFF DIRECT—the PUFF PRELIMINARY—the PUFF COLLATERAL—the PUFF COLUSIVE, and the PUFF OBLIQUE, or PUFF by IMPLICATION.—These all assume, as circumstances require, the various forms of LETTER TO THE EDITOR—OCCASIONAL ANECDOTE—IMPARTIAL CRITIQUE—OBSERVATION FROM CORRESPONDENT,—or ADVERTISEMENT FROM THE PARTY.

Sneer. The puff direct, I can conceive——

Puff. O yes, that's simple enough,—for instance—A new Comedy or Farce is to be produced at one of the Theatres (though by the bye they don't bring out half what they ought to do). The author, suppose Mr Smatter, or Mr Dapper—or any particular friend of mine—very well; the day before it is to be performed, I write an account of the manner in which it was received—I have the plot from the author,—and only add—Characters strongly drawn—highly coloured—hand of a master—fund of genuine humour—mine of invention—neat dialogue—attic salt! Then for the performance—Mr DODD was astonishingly great in the character of SIR HARRY! That universal and judicious actor, Mr PALMER, perhaps never appeared to more advantage than in the COLONEL ;—but it is not in the power of language to do justice to Mr KING !—Indeed he more than merited those repeated bursts of applause which he drew from a most brilliant and judicious audience ! As to the scenery—The miraculous power of Mr DE LOUTHERBOURG'S pencil are universally acknowledged !—In short, we are at a loss which to admire most, —the unrivalled genius of the author, the great attention and liberality of the managers—the wonderful abilities of the painter, or the incredible exertions of all the performers !——

THE BALLAD-OPERA & PANTOMIME

Sneer. That's pretty well indeed, Sir.

Puff. O cool—quite cool—to what I sometimes do.

It may seem that the quotations from these burlesques have been here too liberal, but in them, and only in them, can we get behind the scenes. They record features we miss in the regular tragedies and comedies ; they lay bare the evils, and show the virtues, of the time.

This digression on the burlesques of the period has taken us some distance from the ballad-opera ; but the two, because of their common satirical tendencies, are ultimately related the one to the other. In its career the ballad-opera frequently adopted a burlesque tone, as in Henry Carey's The Dragon of Wantley (1737) and its sequel, Margery : or, A Worse Plague than the Dragon (1738). The ballad-operas, indeed, assumed all the forms of regular non-musical drama ; there are burlesques among them, and regular farces, now in the Jonsonian manner, now in the style of intrigue, and there are definitely sentimental works calculated to display the humaneness and virtue of mankind. A number of these ballad-operas fully deserve reviving, but the majority are sufficiently trivial, evidently the production of writers eager to run together a work which might bring to their empty pockets a few honest guineas. A few, such as Cibber's Damon and Phillida (1729) and John Hippisley's Flora (1729), proved successful, but none until the appearance of Sheridan's The Duenna (1775) rivalled the popularity of Gay's triumph of 1728. The Duenna, certainly, from the literary point of view, well deserved its success. The characters are well drawn, especially that of Isaac ; the airs are pretty and sometimes distinguished by true lyric melody; the dialogue rarely falls to dullness and frequently rises to flashes of true wit.

BRITISH DRAMA

This play of Sheridan's in reality introduces us to a new type of dramatic art, the comic opera,¹ a type fully established by Isaac Bickerstaff, who won a marked success in The Maid of the Mill (1765) and in Lionel and Clarissa (1768). The comic opera, particularly that which displayed romantic features, was an important factor in the development of early nineteenth-century literature. It was given new life in the delightful fantasies of Gilbert and Sullivan; and still makes its appeal to the adherents of at least one great London theatre.

¹ There is, technically, a distinction between the ballad-opera (with words written to older airs) and the comic opera (with words composed by an individual musician).

CHAPTER IV

THE DECAY OF TRUE COMEDY AND THE GROWTH OF SENTIMENTALISM

THE SENTIMENTAL MOVEMENT

IN dealing with tragedy it was noted that the chief weakness of the age lay in a want of a true orientation. Many dramatists had genuine talent for the stage, but they possessed no definite and conscious purpose in their art. The same precisely may be said for comedy. The manners type, which had produced Etherege, Wycherley, and Congreve, was rapidly degenerating when Farquhar and Vanbrugh took it over. A few other dramatists, such as Charles Burnaby and Mrs Centlivre, tried to keep it alive; but it had lost its original abandon and could never again assume quite the same Cavalier tone it had exhibited in the Restoration age.

Farce was occupying more and more attention; sentimentalism was rapidly growing in strength; pity was creeping into the world of intellectual laughter. It is necessary here, for an understanding of the tendencies of the time, to analyse if but briefly the development of this sentimental movement. Sentiment, as Charlotte Brontë found in Shirley, means only thought, idea, or conception; in itself, therefore, sentimentalism is not a quality to be despised; but it is imperative that a distinction should be made between the true and false species of this mood. In its weaker form sentimentalism implies an unmanly pity, a lack of strength, and sometimes a certain puritanical hypocrisy. In these forms it is displayed clearly enough in Mackenzie's The Man of Feeling and in Richardson's Pamela. But sentimentalism can mean, and did mean, more than this. Steele's hatred of duelling and his belief in matrimonial fidelity were sentimental, but they implied true courage. It was daring for a man in his position, in the midst of a sneering society, to utter the thoughts he did. Rousseau too is sentimental, but with him sentimentalism denotes humanitarianism, and sometimes revolutionary aims. We may, perhaps, distinguish these three as the main forms of this strange eighteenth-century development. False sentimentalism may be seen in many mawkish works of the time ; true sentimentalism implying thought and reflection is well displayed in Steele ; the humanitarian sentimentalism, which is a later growth, is reflected in the plays of Mrs Inchbald.

BRITISH DRAMA

In many different ways sentimentalism exercised an influence, both good and evil, on the comedy of the time. If, on the one hand, it destroyed the possibility of free laughter, untrammelled by any considerations save its own mirth, it opened up fresh tracts for the playwrights, and gave birth to an entirely new type of dramatic work. We may thus regret that there could never appear another Etherege or another Congreve blissfully ignorant of any moral obligations, but we must at the same time recognize that the new humanitarianism, the recognition of social problems, the endeavour to make the theatre express in its own way the many problems which faced men and women, was a good thing, a development which lay at the back of all the best modern dramatic art. It is useless to extol sentimentalism for what it was not, to refuse to see in it often the elements of a false hypocrisy ; but it is equally useless to condemn it wholeheartedly as do some who see the theatre only in the light of the comedy of manners.

This sentimental movement may be traced back to the early eighties of the seventeenth century. It is probable that the political interest which centred round the last days of Charles II, the reign of James II, and the Rebellion had something to do with its appearance in the dramatic literature of the time. Men in those years began to think of the problems of government and of religion, and from those they were led naturally to a consideration of the problems of social life. This consideration of life's problems coincided with the development of a reaction to the excesses

280

DESIGN BY JOHN WEBB FOR ORRERY'S "MUSTAPHA"

*Copyright of His Grace the Duke of Devonshire
Photograph by the Victoria and Albert Museum*

SCENE IN SETTLE'S "THE EMPRESS OF MOROCCO"

THE DECAY OF TRUE COMEDY

of the Stuart Court, and together the two forces moved forward rapidly. Touches of a reflective cast crept into comedies and tragedies; men such as D'Urfey, women such as Mrs Behn, began to introduce into their plays themes which displayed their consciousness of the difficulties that arose out of social conventions. Even Shadwell, a confirmed Jonsonian, felt the impress of the time and gave expression to it in his later productions. Interesting as it is, however, to trace the gradual emergence of this sentimental spirit in the comedy of the late seventeenth century we must recognize that during this period it was purely tentative and experimental. Sufficient strength it had, certainly, to lead Colley Cibber, a dramatist always eager to satisfy popular tastes, to write his Love's Last Shift (1696), but it produced no single play of a definitely sentimental cast. Love's Last Shift by many has been taken as the starting-point of the sentimental movement; it is merely the first play written consciously to express a feeling which subconsciously had been present in the theatre for more than a decade previously. This comedy marks the beginning of a long series of similar dramas to which may be given the title 'moral-immoral.' It displays, that is to say, the ordinary licentious comic characters and themes of the day with a would-be moral ending in which rapid conversions are attributed to those who had been in the earlier acts presented as sinners. Nothing shows better the hypocritical veneer which spreads over the age. The reformers were satisfied because virtue triumphed in the end; the pleasure-loving spectators were willing to witness the wholly artificial conversions for the sake of the careless intrigue and loose dialogue of the preceding scenes.

If Cibber was the first to produce a play deliberately designed to catch the temper of the age, he was not by any means the chief or the most sentimentally inclined of the early eighteenth-century dramatists. Indeed, in his own way he aided in keeping alive something of the spirit of the manners school in his 'genteel' comedies, works which by their artificiality well reflected the social life of the

BRITISH DRAMA

Anne era. She Wou'd and She Wou'd Not (1702 ; printed 1703), The Double Gallant, or, The Sick Lady's Cure (1707), The Lady's Last Stake, or, The Wife's Resentment (1707 ; printed 1708), and The Refusal ; or, The Ladies Philosophy (1721), with their affected, vain ladies and their foppish gallants, mirror perfectly a section of this society. Wit of the Congreve sort no longer breathes in these. There is nothing of that rich play of fancy which marks out the latter's works. Instead, we are presented with all the fashionable follies, all the darling vices, of the town. Men and women in those plays no longer hold the same positions they held in Restoration days. Then, the men, if trivially gallant, had at least the gift of intellectual power, and the women were possessed of qualities akin to those of their male companions. Intrigue governed the lives of both, but men and women entered into these intrigues with an equal zest and on equal terms. In the genteel comedies, on the other hand, the men were mere beaux intent not on a satire, a lampoon, a witty jest, but on wigs and shoes and ribbons ; their haunt was not the meeting-place of the wits, but the gambling saloons. The women too had degenerated. Their minds were more centred upon trivialities, and they had lost their intellectual power. They had become the playthings of men, to be ridiculed, cheated, and satirized. The women of the Restoration period may have fallen in love with the licentious gallants, but it was with open eyes ; now we are approaching the period of the Lovelaces and the Clarissa Harlowes.

The genteel comedy endured all through the eighteenth century, but rapidly it became merged in the sentimental type, so that one of the most typical of Augustan comic forms is that species of drama wherein certain scenes recall the atmosphere of these Cibberian works, and other scenes revel in the expression of the most fulsomely sentimental reflections.

The sentimental movement in the early eighteenth century received its most pronounced impetus from the activities of Sir Richard Steele, author of The Christian Hero and joint author of The Spectator. Steele's predilections, in spite of his own somewhat careless life, were all on the side of morality. He believed in domestic happiness, he believed in faithful love, he believed in the goodness of the human heart. It is not surprising, therefore, to find that in his four comedies—The Funeral ; Or, Grief A-la-mode (1701; printed 1702), The Lying Lover : or, The Ladies Friendship (1703; printed 1704), The Tender Husband : Or, The Accomplish'd Fools (1705), and The Conscious Lovers (1722; printed 1723)—he should have endeavoured to give utterance to his own genuinely sincere reflections upon life. The first of these plays shows his hatred of hypocrisy and his belief in sterling emotion as expressed in the characters of Lady Harriot and of the honest old servant Trusty. The Lying Lover penetrates even more deeply into the realm of emotion and of serious reflection. The author's hatred of duelling is fully exemplified in the gaol-scene, when Young Bookwit lies in imminent fear of execution and in contriteness of heart. The question of domestic virtue occupies his mind in The Tender Husband, a play which inculcates that honourable love which was one of Steele's chief delights. Excellent as these comedies are, Steele's triumph lies in his last play, in the plot of which he has endeavoured to express his innermost feelings. The hero, Bevil junior, is here presented as about to be married to Lucinda, the daughter of Sealand. He has, however, met and befriended an unknown girl named Indiana, with whom he ultimately falls in love. Unlike the rakes of earlier times he will not endeavour to betray this girl, nor will he marry her without his father's consent. For a time it almost seems as if the play is to end unhappily, until Sealand discovers in Indiana his own daughter. The artificiality of the conclusion may perhaps call forth from modern readers a superior smile, but no superior smiling can lessen the genuine worth of Steele's comedy. The dialogue is excellent, the characters are well drawn, and the situations cleverly managed; and how far Steele has succeeded in drawing comedy from the realms of Restoration licence may be realized even by a cursory glance at one or two of the scenes. This play is hardly a comedy ; it approaches the sphere of the drame, that intermediate land where emotions seem to move midway between tragic intensity and comic abandon.

THE DECAY OF TRUE COMEDY

BRITISH DRAMA

For some years the sentimental style developed but slowly. Sentimentalism, it is true, coloured many an otherwise unsentimental production, but no one for a time succeeded in penning a truly great work of this type. In 1705 Mrs Centlivre produced The Gamester, a well-written comedy designed to ridicule the fashionable evils of the gaming-tables, and Taverner in 1717 brought forward The Artful Wife, a comedy full of moral reflections planned according to the best sentimental recipes ; but these, after all, are not great plays and introduce little that is new. Shortly after 1730, however, two developments are noticeable, each of which was to exercise definite influence on the fortunes of the type in the later years of the century. The first of these tendencies was heralded by one John Kelly in The Married Philosopher (1732). This drama has the merit of being the first adaptation in English of a French sentimental work. The importance that attaches to this innovation can be realized only by a glance at the development of the French theatre in the first three decades of the century. Sentimentalism, in its initial stages, was almost entirely an English development. It arose in the midst of Restoration licence and flourished quite independently of Continental example. A change, however, was coming over France as well, a change which three-quarters of a century later was to result in the fury of the Revolution. That change ultimately was inspired by English example. Tentatively the French playwrights started by adapting works which had first seen the light on the London stage. Apologetically they tried their first experiments, until, grown bolder, they triumphantly flared forth their fanfare of literary revolt. That revolt took the form of an extreme type of sentimentalism. There was little of hypocrisy here, none of that crude admixture of licence and moral reflection which distinguished so many English comedies of the time. The Parisian sentimentalists determined from the start to give to mankind their beliefs in the inherent goodness of the human soul, in the corrupting ways of society, in the virtue of primitive emotions. Many lesser matters they touched on, such as the evils of war and the oppressions of the poor, but those were their fundamental tenets. It is evident that here we possess the Steele type of sentimentalism carried to still further extremes, and it is equally evident that there is here the literary counterpart of those political aspirations which led ultimately to the downfall of the ancien régime. For the study of the English theatre this development of serious comedy in France is especially important, for the Continental sentimental drama, nourished as it had been on English example, was freely brought back to London in the middle of the eighteenth century, giving rise to a more pronounced sentimental note in our own theatre. Kelly's work is the herald of that return.

284

THE DECAY OF TRUE COMEDY

From this rough sketch of the growth of the French drame in the eighteenth century, necessarily brief and limned only in general outline, it is clear that direct revolutionary ideas must develop from the cardinal tenets mentioned as belonging to the dramatists. This revolutionary mood finds its echo, too, in the English theatre, becoming first noticeable a few years after the appearance of Kelly's The Married Philosopher in Robert Dodsley's The King and the Miller of Mansfield (1737), a little playlet which strives to show the inherent community between the sentiments of king and subject, and endeavours to read into its few scenes a definite moral precept. Never so powerful a force in London as it was in Paris, because of the greater liberty and lack of tyranny here, this revolutionary note is also a marked feature of later sentimental endeavour.

It might have been expected that after the thirties of the eighteenth century sentimentalism, thus possessed of inspiration and a definite purpose, would have produced some masterpieces of serious comedy. The actual results, on the contrary, were poor. If sentimentalism brought something new to the theatre it at the same time proved fatally easy of execution. Playwrights found that the calling forth of emotional scenes required no great exertions, and the coining of reflective sentences for their characters was simple enough. The style, too, led men away from realism. In order to paint, as they thought, more truly the humane qualities of mankind they had recourse to the ideal. They painted not the men and women they saw round them, but abstractions conceived in their own minds. The keen observations and realistic touches which had always brightened earlier comedy began, therefore, to disappear, and vapid, colourless, uninteresting productions were the result. Sentimentalism, too, allied to the genteel comedy, brought about a peculiar convention. In the end it cut out of the theatre all kinds of 'low' characters. A noble savage once or twice might be permitted entrance into the drawing-room, but artisans and the world of labour were studiously shunned. The sentimental drama became pre-eminently the drama of middle- and upper-class society, with conversations and scenery to match.

BRITISH DRAMA

Many authors after 1750 took to writing these popular works, but none devoted their energies with such unflagging zeal to the cause of the sentimental muse as did Hugh Kelly and Richard Cumberland, contemporaries and companions of Oliver Goldsmith. The first of these two men won a prodigious success with his False Delicacy (1768), a comedy eagerly read as well as eagerly followed upon the stage, and repeated that success with his School for Wives (1773). A Word to the Wise (1770), an equally sentimental play, was unsuccessful because of political prejudice. False Delicacy is a play of sentimental refinement which keeps three pairs of unsuited lovers in a constant state of mental and emotional disturbance. Into this theme of conflicting feelings Kelly infuses a mass of reflective sentences all calculated to further the cause of the highest morality. Moments of laughter there are, but rare and fitful in their appearance, by no means calculated to rival the attractions of the sentimental portion. From the purely literary point of view A Word to the Wise is the better play, although its historical importance is much slighter. Here Sir John Dormer desires his daughter to marry Sir George Hastings, a fop. Her heart is given to Villars, the sentimental hero and long-lost son of Willoughby. In her distress the heroine confides in Sir George, and he, though foppish, is sufficiently sympathetic to break off the match, and all ends happily. That Kelly felt at times the ridiculousness of the type he patronized seems proved by Miss Dormer's remark in the first act, "Upon my word, Harriot, a very florid winding up of a period, and very proper for an elevated thought in a sentimental comedy." As with the dramatists of the heroic tragedy, there seems to have been a consciousness among these 'feeling' authors that they were attempting a form of literature capable of vast absurdities.

286

THE DECAY OF TRUE COMEDY

Richard Cumberland continued the same style with even greater enthusiasm. His famous work The West Indian (1771) won for him immense repute, and the sentimental atmosphere he reproduced in The Fashionable Lover (1772), The Jew (1794), The Wheel of Fortune (1795), and a multitude of other pieces in which the characters are all cast in the same mould, uninformed by realistic qualities. The first of these introduces a hero well beloved by those of Cumberland's kin, the slightly rakish youth with a benevolent heart. This gentleman is presented to us as attempting to seduce Louisa Dudley, but, after a series of conflicting purposes and exciting scenes, he marries her, to find that she is by way of being an heiress. The situations are not unskilfully woven together, but it is perfectly plain to even the most ignorant reader that the whole plot of the work is impossible and that the characters act and speak as no living characters would have done. The Jew exhibits much the same features. No one of sense will here quarrel with Cumberland's aim, which is sympathetic and humane, but impossible goodness and artificiality mar the whole.

Kelly and Cumberland, as we have seen, by no means stood alone, and other writers perhaps succeeded in writing better, if less popular, plays than any of theirs. Thus as early as 1748 Edward Moore produced an excellently planned comedy in The Foundling, a work designed to "steal the pitying Tear from Beauty's Eye" and dealing with a theme (that of unknown parentage) beloved by the sentimentalists from the time of Steele's The Conscious Lovers to that of Cumberland's The West Indian. A son sympathetically searching for his father, or a maiden cast parentless upon the world, was sure to call forth that pitying tear in the eighteenth century, even although it can only provoke an incredulous smile in our own. So, too, at a slightly later date Thomas Holcroft ably carried on the tradition. His best-known play, long a stock piece on the stage, was The Road to Ruin (1792), but his revolutionary and sentimental proclivities are enshrined in well over a score of dramas. In this 'comedy' we are introduced to a hero in Harry Dornton, who has ruined himself by gambling. Riotous as he is, however, he has a feeling heart, and is cast into despair when he hears that his follies are about to bring ruin on his father. In order to expiate his crimes he proposes to marry Mrs Warren, a rich old widow. In the end, of course, all comes right, with due rewards and punishments. Here again we are introduced to the benevolent libertine, and the revolutionary note which Holcroft would dearly have loved to weave into the play is well brought out in the prologue. The actor who enters to introduce the comedy pretends that the author's original verses have been lost, and proposes to extemporize :

BRITISH DRAMA

The author had mounted on the stilts of oratory and elocution :
Not but he had a smart touch or two, about Poland, France, and the—the revolution ;
Telling us that Frenchmen, and Polishmen, and every man is our brother ;
And that all men, ay, even poor negro men, have a right to be free ; one as well as another !
Freedom at length, said he, like a torrent is spreading and swelling,
To sweep away pride and reach the most miserable dwelling :
To ease, happiness, art, science, wit, and genius to give birth ;
Ay, to fertilize a world, and renovate old earth !

By Holcroft's time, of course, the Continental influence had reached its height. Probably his are the translations from Brandes and from Bouilly, entitled respectively The German Hotel (1790) and Deaf and Dumb, or, The Orphan Protected (1801). In the first we are treated to a thoroughly melodramatic story, with a villainous Baron Thorck, a sympathetic Dorville, and a distressed heroine. The second is even more serious in tone. The scene is laid in France. In Paris the evil Darlemont has purposely lost the child Count Julio. The latter is befriended by the good old Abbé de l'Épée, who brings him to Toulouse. There they tell the story to Franval, sister of Mariamne, whom St Almes, Darlemont's son, loves. The truth becomes apparent, and Darlemont dies, leaving happiness to the true of heart.

THE DECAY OF TRUE COMEDY

(ii) THE OLDER TRADITION IN GOLDSMITH AND SHERIDAN

It is evident here that comedy has departed far from its original home. In place of laughter, tears; in place of intrigue, melodramatic and distressing situations; in place of rogues and gallants and witty damsels, pathetic heroines and serious lovers and honest servants—this is what we discover in the typical sentimental drama of the late eighteenth century. We are in the world of the drame, not of comedy; in the realm of the emotions, not of the intellect. It must not be supposed, of course, that sentimentalism completely dominated the age. Farce still retained its power, and there were many attempts to awake the muse of laughter. Many saw the follies of the sentimental kind. Whitehead gave expression satirically to a common thought when in A Trip to Scotland (1770) he makes Sotherton declare that “the good company will perceive, that whatever effect the late run of sentimental comedies may have had upon their audiences, they have at least made the players men of honour”; and Cobb has a characteristic passage in The First Floor (1787):

Young Whimsey. Hey-day! what's become of the exquisite luxury of a feeling mind in relieving distress?

Furnish. It may do very well for people of fortune, but a tradesmen [sic] shou'd never indulge in luxury.

Young Whimsey. Consider, generosity is part of the business of man.

Furnish. And a d——d losing trade it is—therefore it shan't be a part of my business.

BRITISH DRAMA

It is worthy of note that according to The Theatrical Dictionary this work met with "great applause."

Sheridan and Goldsmith were, of course, the leaders of the anti-sentimental movement, but they had been preceded by many dramatists who kept to the older paths. Samuel Foote, a prolific writer of the third quarter of the century, thus poured forth a series of more or less farcical pieces packed with personal satire. The Knights (1749) is of this type, as is The Orators (1762); less of satire but more of farcical wit appear in The Minor (1760) and in The Maid of Bath (1771), although the former contains a direct attack upon the Methodists, and the latter introduces a portrait of Miss Linley, later to be the wife of Richard Brinsley Sheridan. Foote's work was varied in style, but in all his plays the same qualities of satire and farcical wit appear. We cannot accord to them the title of true comedies, but in them is preserved something of the older style of comic composition.

Various other dramatists supplied the theatre with similar fare during Foote's lifetime. George Colman, generally known as 'the Elder' to distinguish him from his son, George Colman the Younger, was one of the most vigorous of those who supported the cause of laughter and opposed sentimental pity. Polly Honeycombe (1760) is a clever satire of contemporary follies, and, as has often been pointed out, anticipates not only in general style but in definite phrases Sheridan's more polished satire in The Rivals. Colman's opposition to the sentimental vein is seen clearly enough in his selection of Tom Jones for the theme of his next work, The Jealous Wife (1761). This comedy is strictly in the style of the Restoration masters, although there is not in it the sparkling wit or delicate touch of the Congreve pen. Nevertheless, the dialogue is capably written, and Colman deserves unstinted praise for his able treatment of his subject-matter. Lord Ogleby in The Clandestine Marriage (1766) is another echo of Restoration days. Fops in Colman's time had not been common, and if they appeared occasionally they were vapid and uninteresting. Lord Ogleby, however, is in the best style of the older comedy, and the presentation of his character well qualified Colman for a place among the true masters of comic portraiture. More numerous touches of a sentimental character appear in Arthur Murphy's plays, but his two comedies The Way to Keep Him (1760) and All in the Wrong (1761) retain something of true comic atmosphere, and many of his lighter pieces belong to the farcical and satiric strain. Later, too, Mrs Hannah Cowley, author of nearly a score of comedies, farces, and tragedies, strove to keep alive the earlier spirit. A Bold Stroke for a Husband (1783) is probably her best-known play, but A School for Greybeards (1786) and The Town Before You (1794) perhaps possess more of the true vis comica. The second of these plays belongs to the Spanish intrigue school and goes back for inspiration to Mrs Behn and Mrs Centlivre. Slight as the vulgarity of this piece seems when compared with the comedies of Mrs Cowley's predecessors, it was nearly damned for its indecency and only won through because of its verve. The plot is a hackneyed one in which Don Gaspar is destined to marry Antonia, who in her turn loves the banished Don Henry. The lover, by disguising himself, manages to insinuate himself into Don Gaspar's house. A sub-plot deals with the gay Seraphnia, wife of Don Alexis, who accepts the attentions of Octavio in order that her step-daughter Viola may escape with her lover, Don Sebastian.

290

THE DECAY OF TRUE COMEDY

These comedies, which are merely a few chosen out of a vast number of similar pieces, show well that even the force of revolutionary French sentimentalism could not completely banish true laughter from the stage. Nearly all of these have been long forgotten because of Goldsmith's and Sheridan's greatness, but many deserve to be remembered for their own intrinsic merits, and some of them gave suggestions to those two writers for their more famous works. Oliver Goldsmith first took up the cudgels against the sentimentally genteel comedy in 1759, when he himself was thirty-one years of age, in his essay on The Present State of Polite Learning, and a decade later, in 1768, dared to bring forward his comedy The Good Natur'd Man as an attack upon the style of Kelly, Cumberland, and their kin. The audience realized fully the cleverness of the work, although their tastes were too hardened to permit them to accept without protest the 'low' scenes which Goldsmith had introduced into his play. Reading the play now, we may perhaps fail to discern wherein exactly Goldsmith departed from the sentimental camp. The concluding lines seem cast entirely in the spirit of the Cumberland style :

BRITISH DRAMA

Honeywood. Heavens ! how can I have deserved all this ? How express my happiness, my gratitude ! A moment, like this, overpays an age of apprehension.

Croaker. Well, now I see content in every face ; but Heaven send we be all better this day three months.

Sir William. Henceforth, nephew, learn to respect yourself. He who seeks only for applause from without, has all his happiness in another's keeping.

Honeywood. Yes, Sir, I now too plainly perceive my errors. My vanity, in attempting to please all, by fearing to offend any. My meanness in approving folly, lest fools should disapprove. Henceforth, therefore, it shall be my study to reserve my pity for real distress ; my friendship for true merit, and my love for her, who first taught me what it is to be happy.

Certainly this shows that Goldsmith had not completely thrown over the shackles of the style he condemned, and similar passages may be found scattered throughout the play. It is when we come to the bailiff scenes in the third act that we begin to see Goldsmith's sly satire of the genteel style. Says the minion of the law :

Looky, Sir, I have arrested as good men as you in my time : no disparagement of you neither. Men that would go forty guineas on a game of cribbage. I challenge the town to shew a man in more genteeler practice than myself. . . . I love to see a gentleman with a tender heart. I don't know, but I think I have a tender heart myself. If all that I have lost by my heart was put together, it would make a—but no matter for that. . . . Humanity, Sir, is a jewel. It's better than gold. I love humanity. People may say, that we, in our way, have no humanity ; but I'll shew you my humanity this moment. There's my follower here, little Flanigan, with a wife and four children, a guinea or two would be more to him, than twice as much to another. Now, as I can't shew him any humanity myself, I must beg leave you'll do it for me. . . . Sir, you're a gentleman. I see you know what to do with your money.

THE DECAY OF TRUE COMEDY

It is small wonder that an eighteenth-century audience which prided itself in its gentility and in its humane sentiments should have objected to this caricature of its dearest qualities.

The Good-natured Man, however, is not really a great play. There are many weaknesses in the plot, much of the dialogue is stilted, and there are scenes wherein the author showed that he had not grasped fully the requirements of the stage. All these deficiencies are remedied in his greater work She Stoops to Conquer, or The Mistakes of a Night (1773). This comedy, of richly deserved fame, betrays a peculiar fusion of forces. It is not a true comedy of manners, yet it clearly owes part of its inspiration to that school of which Farquhar was one of the last true representatives. In atmosphere it approaches more closely to Shakespeare's romantic comedy, which, it may be noted, after about 1735, had rapidly come into an esteem which it had not enjoyed since the early seventeenth century. There breathes over the play an atmosphere of romantic sentiment—not the sentimentalism of Goldsmith's contemporaries, but a peculiar union of intellect and emotion which colours the figures and words of Hardcastle and of Tony Lumpkin and of Diggory alike. This humour Goldsmith unquestionably owes to his Irish parentage and upbringing. There is the sly smile, the concealed wit, the emotional and sincere kindness which marks out the comedies of Shakespeare as well as the lesser works of many nineteenth-century Scots and Irish novelists. Tony Lumpkin himself is of the kin of Falstaff. He is a fool and yet a wit; his follies make us laugh at him, but his clever tricks cause him to be the source of laughter in other men. For once, in the eighteenth century, the spirit of Twelfth Night was revived.

Entirely different in character and in aim, save for a common objection to the sentimental style, Richard Brinsley Sheridan continued Goldsmith's work. His plays date from 1775, the year which saw the production of The Rivals, to the end of the eighteenth century, when his adaptation of Kotzebue's drama Pizarro won him enormous popularity. Within those years Sheridan's activity was constant. The ballad-opera entitled The Duenna (1775) has already been noted above, but this takes second place to The School for Scandal (1777), The Critic ; or A Tragedy Rehearsed (1779 ; printed 1781), and even A Trip to Scarborough (1777 ; printed 1781). None of these in any way resembles Goldsmith's plays. The Rivals presents, not an admixture of Shakespearian humour with features of the school of manners, but the very atmosphere of Congreve modified by exaggerated humours of the Jonsonian type. The names of the characters are mostly of the humours sort—Sir Lucius O'Trigger, Sir Anthony Absolute, and Lydia Languish may be taken as examples—and the exaggeration of special traits is well shown in the notorious Mrs Malaprop. In the main this comedy presents a direct challenge to the sentimentalists, although in the Julia and Faulkland portions there are evident features of the Cumberland style. Lydia's love of a romantic elopement, however, and her fantastic notions of a lover's duties are clearly modelled as satires on the yet popular style. The Rivals, as a whole, is a somewhat disappointing play. Some scenes in it are so excellent that we notice all the more clearly the weaknesses in the whole plan. Sentimental motives clash with elements taken from the Congreve school ; Jonsonian exaggeration conflicts heavily with the play of wit and fancy. About the whole play, too, breathes an atmosphere of farce, and although there is something of farce in every great comedy this lower strain tends to weaken the general effect of Sheridan's work.

BRITISH DRAMA

The School for Scandal is a more homogeneous work of art. Nothing truly disturbs the constant glitter of its wit, and the situations are never exaggerated or bizarre ; rather do they stand forward as among the most perfect in the English theatre. No single scene possibly has won so much fame as the screen episode in Act IV of this play. Again there is satire of the sentimental strain in the person of Joseph Surface, but this direct satire is subordinated to the expression of free wit which irradiates all the characters. There is no attempt here to catch the subtle delicacy of Goldsmith's comedies, no effort to seize upon the inner movements of the human heart, no introduction of kindness or emotion ; all is crystal clear, and that which furnishes the humour of the play is, as in the comedies of Etherege and Congreve, not the traits of mankind, but their social manners.

THE DECAY OF TRUE COMEDY

With The School for Scandal we reach the culmination of the anti-sentimental movement. This, as it were, was the last word of the Augustan writers, for sentimentalism is, in its own way, the forerunner of romance. Kelly and Cumberland passed away, but out of their supersensitive style arose the deeper humanitarianism of the revolutionary and romantic periods. The poets of the nineteenth century, full of heroic ardours and serious ideals, were not given to laughter, and the comedy of manners for nearly a century vanished from the world of creative drama.

CHAPTER V

THE DOMESTIC TRAGEDY

WITH the treatment of Goldsmith and Sheridan we have passed into the camp of the anti-sentimentalists. It will now be necessary to return to the beginning of the eighteenth century and the rise of the sentimental school in order to trace a dramatic development intimately connected with that school, which ultimately produced the dramatic form known as the domestic tragedy.

Domestic tragedy, as we have seen, had been known in the early seventeenth century, producing then a distinguished masterpiece in Heywood's A Woman Killed with Kindness; but in the progress of romantic tragi-comedy and of the heroic drama this domestic note ceased to be remembered. Playwrights passed to the East for inspiration, and could see no sorrows but those of kings and princely heroes. The pathetic movement, however, marked in the plays of Banks and Otway pointed to a reaction from this style. In The Orphan the characters are aristocratic, but not royal; in Banks' plays the heroes and heroines are taken from English history. Thomas Southerne was bold enough to make the central figure of his Oroonoko (1696) an ill-used native chief. It is hard to call forth pity for impossible Oriental heroes, and the dramatists saw that in order to achieve their purpose they would have to deal with themes nearer home. Tentatively they began, as has been seen, to treat of English history and of heroes under the rank of princes and emperors. This attempt to deal with humbler themes brought with it a change of style. In the first place, in order to bring the dialogue more into harmony with the subject all the inflated language inherited from the heroic school began to disappear. The conversation became more ordinary, and the blank verse struggled to emancipate itself into prose. Secondly, with the loss of royal dignity the playwrights endeavoured to throw into their dramas an additional air of terror and awe, and, in doing so, they captured again something of that spirit of fate which is associated with the names of Æschylus and Shakespeare. Actions in these plays were dependent not merely upon the motives of the characters, but upon the workings of some unseen and tremendous cosmic force.

296

THE DOMESTIC TRAGEDY

In the eighteenth century itself the first example of this type of 'fatal' drama was The Rival Brothers (1704), a tragedy based on The Orphan; the first example of a serious play with wholly middle-class English characters followed a few years later in Aaron Hill's The Fatal Extravagance (1721), a work which returns for inspiration to the pseudo-Shakespearian Yorkshire Tragedy. These plays, and others of a similar nature, laid the basis for the appearance of George Lillo's The London Merchant; or The History of George Barnwell (1731), a play which fluttered all London society when it was first produced and remained a stock piece for many years. The influence of the sentimental style is clearly visible in this work. The aim is definitely moral, and serious reflections, often wholly undramatic, appear in almost every scene as they do in the comedies of Kelly and of Cumberland. Notwithstanding this, Lillo's endeavour marks the beginning of a new era of tragic activity in England. Here at last was found one daring enough to make the hero of a tragedy a mere apprentice; here was one who succeeded in calling forth from the breasts of fashionable spectators tears for an ordinary middle-class family. Hardly anyone at the time failed to realize its power. Men of letters praised it. Royalty perused it in palace boudoir. Spectators flocked again and again to see it on the stage. Foreign dramatists, seeing the possibilities of the type, hastened to adapt it and pen other imitations of its style. Unassuming as it appeared to be, The London Merchant marked the downfall of the classical tragedy, drove outworn themes from the stage, and established the basis of the modern theatre.

This work Lillo followed with Fatal Curiosity, a finely written tragedy which deals with an ordinary peasant couple led by poverty to commit a terrible crime. The plot is simple but effective, and the atmosphere of fate which Lillo has succeeded in casting into his play proves his true flair for the theatre. Like The London Merchant, Fatal Curiosity was translated into several languages, and the story gave inspiration in our own time to the youthful Rupert Brooke for his Lithuania.

BRITISH DRAMA

By the time when Fatal Curiosity was produced the eighteenth-century audiences had become well accustomed to the novel form of drama which had grown up among them, although the supersensitiveness of sentimentalism would not permit them to witness anything savouring of 'lowness.' They did not call George Barnwell 'low,' but they decided that the Mrs Lupine scenes in Charles Johnson's Cælia (1732) had that quality, and accordingly damned the tragedy. Witnessing the success of Lillo, other dramatists attempted to pen plays of a similar character. Thus John Hewitt came forward with his Fatal Falsehood: or Distress'd Innocence (1734) and Thomas Cooke with his peculiarly named play The Mournful Nuptials, or Love the Cure of all Woes (printed 1739; acted as Love the Cause and Cure of Grief, or The Innocent Murderer, 1743), but these are not great plays. In each are some sparks of genius, but the dialogue in both is dull, and the characters, albeit more interestingly delineated than the characters of pseudo-classic tragedy, lack vitality. Only one author, indeed, rises to true heights in this style. That author is Edward Moore, who in The Gamester (1753) produced an affecting and effective domestic tragedy. The story is one of unrelieved misery. Beverley, the hero, rushes into financial ruin through his inordinate passion for gambling. Reduced to his last few coppers, he takes his wife's jewels, and, playing recklessly, loses them. In the meantime, Lewson, the lover of Beverley's sister Charlotte, discovers the evil machinations of the hero's pretended friend Stukely. The latter, realizing that his exposure is imminent, instructs his tool Bates to murder the lover; he is assumed to be dead, and the blame is cast on Beverley, who in his misery takes poison and dies after hearing that a large sum of money has been left to him. The only gleam of sunshine comes from the discovery that Lewson is still alive and will probably be united to his beloved Charlotte. Moore's triumph rests in his grimly concentrated effect. Save for the slightly developed love between Lewson and Charlotte, hardly anything extraneous is permitted to intrude into the play. A dark air broods over the whole, and the weight of tragic intensity raises The Gamester to a level with the best of our bourgeois tragedies.

298

THE DOMESTIC TRAGEDY

It may appear strange that with this rapid development of middle-class drama in the middle of the eighteenth century the type should not have been favoured by other dramatists in the later decades of the century or in the romantic period proper. Several tendencies, however, operated against its success. In the first place, sentimentalism inclined toward the drame rather than tragedy. A genteel audience felt so pleased with itself when after indulging in its best of pitying tears it found the sinner reclaimed and the distressed maiden saved, sympathy rewarded and evil exposed, that the dramatists were loth to destroy their pretty taste. Accordingly The Road to Ruin took the place of The Gamester. Secondly, the power of appreciating tragic intensity of purpose was rapidly being lost. The heroic drama, the pseudo-classic and the pathetic tragedy, had by degrees weakened the appreciation of the spectators. Show and opera had brought them to desire their tragedies to be dizenied out with ample scenic decorations and vitiated with music. Even in Macbeth they preferred the witches to be three pretty chorus girls rather than the weird hags that Shakespeare imagined. Thirdly, the romantic poets, who might have done something for this style, were nearly all wrapt up in their idealistic visions of Italy and the East. They looked with contempt upon the squalid slums and vapid suburbs of London, and preferred to write of Spanish castles, of ruined Italian abbeys, of Oriental adventurings. Never could they restrain themselves to come down to the world of ordinary life, to feel ordinary sorrows and appreciate ordinary joys, to thrill the hearts of their readers not by the glorious rhapsody of inspired imagination, but by simple touches requiring no less genius and skill. After its rapid rise in the eighteenth century the bourgeois drama in England died. It was left to French and German playwrights to bring the form to perfection and reintroduce it once more on the London stage.

BRITISH DRAMA

PART V

DRAMA IN THE EARLY NINETEENTH CENTURY

CHAPTER I

THE MAIN TENDENCIES OF THE TIME

AFTER the appearance of Sheridan and Goldsmith the drama rapidly decayed. For this several reasons may be brought forward, each of which must be considered in relation to the others. Chief in importance, unquestionably, is that which concerns the size of the playhouses. In 1787 the Theatre Royal in Covent Garden was enlarged, and five years later it was rebuilt; Drury Lane about the same time witnessed a similar transformation. The results were as might have been expected. The profits of those in charge of the theatres were sometimes much larger than before, because of the increased seating accommodation, but the distance of the stage from the pit and galleries rendered subtle acting impossible and forced the performers to indulge in rant and bombast. It is not mere fancy to argue this as one of the main causes of dramatic decay. Contemporaries were unanimous in declaiming against these lofty structures. Mrs Siddons herself, we are told, made her inflections coarser and rougher; the flash of repartee was impossible; the tender whisper or the excited aside were rendered ridiculous by the necessity which lay upon the actor to shout, if his words were to carry to the topmost galleries. Scott and Joanna Baillie, with many others, proclaimed, in the words of the latter, that "the largeness of our two regular theatres, so unfavourable for hearing clearly, has changed in a great measure the character of pieces exhibited within their walls." It is clear that in these theatres anything approaching the comedy of manners would have been impossible, that subtle tragedy would have failed to appeal, that only the roughest and rudest effects could be employed. Hence the rise and popularity of the spectacular play. Never before had scenic artists and machinists had so much to do. All kinds of gorgeous tableaux were arranged. The words of the drama mattered little so long as the plot was crudely indicated and plenty of opportunity given to the manager to devise attractive scenes and ensembles. So, too, the power of music increased. Choruses which filled with sound the huge spaces of the theatres made great appeal, and melodrama with its songs, its stereotyped characters, its boldly delineated plot, became the form of dramatic literature par excellence.

BRITISH DRAMA

It was probably the size of these theatres which served to intensify the evils of the audience. Society was libertine and vulgar, and the upper-class people set a tone in the playhouses which was aped by the more dissolute among the bourgeoisie. From contemporaries we learn of the number of prostitutes who thronged the foyers, of the countless assignations made in the theatres, of the coarse language heard on all sides, of the drunkenness and the rioting. Boaden in his Life of Kemble (1825) tells a characteristic story. Coriolanus was being performed one November evening in the year 1806, Mrs Siddons herself playing the part of Volumnia. "When," says the author, "Mrs Siddons was supplicating as Volumnia, the conqueror, her son, to spare his country; when every eye should have been riveted to the scene, every ear burning with the pure flame of patriot vehemence—at such a moment an apple was thrown upon the stage, and fell between Mrs Siddons and Mr Kemble." Kemble naturally protested vigorously and received a verbal reply "that this apple was thrown at some of the disorderly females in the boxes." Debauchery, fashionable vice, evils of all kinds centred in these houses of amusement, and the saner, soberer people who might have aided toward the elaboration of a finer drama were forced to keep themselves apart.

The size of the theatres, the prevailing show and spectacle demanding and supplied, and the class of spectators who frequented them naturally led many men who might have devoted their genius to the drama to turn to other forms of literature. Of what use was it to pen plays, to work out with the sweat of the brow some soul-consuming tragedy, when the manager, superciliously superior, condemned it as not affording sufficient opportunities for the exercise of the stage-carpenter's craft? In point of fact, we find in this period an ever-widening gulf between the men of letters and the theatre. Nearly every poet of the time attempted to create something in the medium of drama, but nearly all were repulsed. The consequence was that when some writer of genius decided to pen a play he did so for the reading public—not because he would not have liked to make money out of a theatrical production, but simply because he knew that there could be no hope for him in the playhouse. Never before were there published so many unacted plays. In the eighteenth century we find the booksellers issuing political pamphlets in dramatic form, but the number of unacted regular comedies and tragedies is comparatively small. In the early nineteenth century every year brought forth its regular series of unacted poetic plays. This separation of the poets from the stage led to an intensification of the evils already noted. It divorced the men of genius from the theatre; it prevented them from learning their trade where alone it could be learned—in the playhouse itself. As a result their plays betray a lack of knowledge of stage requirements even beyond their not always sincere declaration that these works were intended only for reading. On the other hand, they left in the service of the theatre only a group of mediocre authors, servile enough to write according to the dictates of a manager himself under the domination of the public. The stage, cut off from the world of literature, gradually grew worse as the years progressed, degenerating rapidly in style and character-delineation.

MAIN TENDENCIES OF THE TIME

It may be noted here that perhaps too much can be made of the prevailing lyrical note of the early nineteenth century. It is assuredly true that all the poets of this time have expressed themselves most perfectly through the medium of lyrical verse, and equally true that the qualities necessary for the production of good lyrical poetry are not by any means such as will produce good drama. At the same time, two points must be noted. The Elizabethan age itself was distinguished as an age of song as well as an age of dramatic creativeness; Shakespeare could express himself not only in Othello and The Tempest, but also in his sonnets and his songs. Moreover, all these romantic poets of the nineteenth century attempted the dramatic form—attempted it, too, in spite of the rebuffs they received from the managers. From Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Scott to Tennyson and Browning we find this is true; and we may legitimately argue that, had these poets been given the opportunity of producing their works upon the stage, their genius might have seemed to-day less lyrical than it is. They would have learned from the theatre the delineation of character; they would have studied theatrical dialogue; they would not have been so wrapped as they were within their own imaginations. Still another thing held them back, and herein they themselves were to blame. Perhaps, had any one of them given to the theatre a form of dramatic literature entirely new, or a style distinctly suited to contemporary conditions, he would have had a hearing. As it was, all of them kept to the old paths, and to these paths they were kept by the critics. What might have spurred the poets to fresh efforts would have been a criticism which devoted itself to technical details, which studied form and plan and tragic aim, the nature of theatrical dialogue, and the management of plot. This criticism, however, has come only in our own days. In the early nineteenth century Lamb's Specimens and Coleridge's Lectures on Shakespeare are characteristic of a general trend of critical judgment. The former does not consider plays as plays; he treats them as collections of poetical passages, those passages being capable of detachment from the whole of which they form a part. But a drama is not a collection of poems; it is, or ought to be, an organic whole, the beauty of which is destroyed as soon as a portion is removed from it, and the charm of whose individual component parts is unintelligible without reference to the others. Coleridge takes a different line of criticism. He is interested in metaphysical disquisitions ; he loves to probe into the psychology of Shakespeare's heroes ; but no more than Lamb does he deal with the plays as works of dramatic art. For all that he says about them, they might as well have been novels. Nowhere does he attempt to show exactly how Shakespeare subordinated his material to the exigencies of the theatre, wherein he showed himself the greatest dramatic genius of all time. Such criticism as this was more than fatal for men who needed the spur of reality and the bridle of hard technical training to fit them for the task they essayed.

BRITISH DRAMA

MAIN TENDENCIES OF THE TIME

Perhaps other causes may be adduced, but all others must be subordinate to these. We may say, for example, that the strict exercise of the censorship in an age when most young poets were revolutionaries was bound to influence the production of plays, and certainly the office of the censor must be accorded its place among the minor contributory causes of dramatic decline. On the other hand, this cannot have been one of the principal reasons ; it merely formed another drop in the mass of water thrown upon the dramatic fire. So, too, we may say that a new reading public had arisen, that the theatre had lost its former appeal, that men and women preferred novels to plays. This, again, is certainly true, but are the playhouses empty to-day during a period of unprecedented fictional activity ? Never, say the publishers, have so many novels been printed as now ; yet men still love to go to the theatre to witness comedy or tragedy, farce or revue. No other form of literature can quite take the place of the drama ; and even Scott's novels, popular as they were, could not have withheld men from the playhouses.

Drama, then, from 1790 onward is seen to divide itself sharply into acted and unacted plays, the former becoming, with the passage of the years, more and more trivial, the latter more and more divorced from theatrical needs. On both, however, operated the same forces. German romance charmed Scott and Shelley as well as the most negligible of dramatists; medievalism affected both; and sentimentalism, now in the guise of mawkish prudery, now in that of rich humanitarianism, dominated both. The two forms, therefore, do not lie so far apart as may appear at first sight.

BRITISH DRAMA

CHAPTER II

THE LITERARY DRAMA

THE 'decline of the drama' was a theme which exercised many men's minds during the period from 1790 to the time when Robertson brought forth something which seemed to betoken the awakening of a new age, and countless efforts were made to provide for the theatre a drama which should be worthier than facile melodrama and miserable farce. Practically all of these attempts, however, were doomed from the very start by the fact that they were indulged in, not, as it were, from within the theatre, but from without. A pronounced tone of superiority accompanies most of this work; instead of coming down to the level of the stage and endeavouring gradually to raise the standards of performance, the literary men persisted in standing, god-like, aloof, carefully and self-consciously lowering down their precious tragedies and dismally monotonous comedies as though these were machine-borne divinities through which alone the evil current of events might be altered. This sense of superiority, allied to a general ignorance of theatrical conditions, marred practically all their efforts.

The general tendency of serious drama in the eighteenth century had been classical. A certain liberalizing element had, it is true, intruded because of the genuine enthusiasm, felt by nearly all, for the plays of Shakespeare, Otway, and Rowe; and through the hesitating imitation of these, the stricter forms of the pseudo-classic stage were oftentimes abandoned—a sparkle of life gleamed fitfully in scenes otherwise mechanically conceived and hopelessly chilled by convention; over all, however, the classic mood predominated. Besides this classical tragedy, there did appear two forms which offered interesting features. The first was the domestic tragedy, inaugurated by Lillo; the second was a type of serious play which might be called pseudo-romantic. Of the latter type John Home's Douglas (1756) was the earliest specimen—a play which, although artificially rhetorical in dialogue and showing manifest signs of indebtedness to the writers of the classic school, yet betrays a certain novelty in its theme (based on the ballad of Gil Morrice) and in its endeavour, not merely to arouse a mildly intellectual interest, but to call on the passionate sympathy of the audience. Neither Home nor his actors, it is true, dared go very far. "On the stage," we are told by a contemporary, writing of this author's The Fatal Discovery (1769), we saw the youthful Roman bounding with all the vigour and alacrity that age, gout, and rheumatism, usually inspire. The heroes of this truly Erse performance,

BRITISH DRAMA

*Who never yet had being,
Or, being, wore no breeches,* were invested in gold and purple, while a Grecian palace was allotted to the monarch of the rock.

This is symbolic of much effort in the kind during the last years of the eighteenth century. The Fatal Discovery takes its theme from Macpherson's Ossian, but this Ossianic theme is classicized almost out of recognition. One or two other similar plays appeared before the year 1800, among them not least in importance being Robert Jephson's The Law of Lombardy (1779), a tragic rendering of the tale told in Much Ado about Nothing, and his The Count of Narbonne (1781), which is based on the thrillingly 'romantic' novel of Horace Walpole, The Castle of Otranto. Walpole himself provided an even more startling unacted play of the type in The Mysterious Mother (1768).

Of these three styles of tragic drama—the classic, the domestic, and the pseudo-romantic—the first, quite naturally, did not receive much formal recognition in an age when poets were revolutionaries battling against those forces of critical restraint which had been imposed on literature by Pope and his companions. There were certainly some fervent supporters, such as John Delap, who had started his career with a Hecuba in 1761 (published 1762) and who carried on his activities till the printing of Abdalla in 1803, and there were others who, like Byron, professed an admiration for the old literary laws and made fitful attempts to follow them in practice. For all essential purposes, however, we may say that the rule of the Augustans was dead.

308

THE LITERARY DRAMA

The domestic tragedy, it might have been thought, would have provided a sphere of legitimate and inspiring activity for the romantics. There was something of novelty here ; there was offered the possibility of searching criticism of life ; there was presented to the dramatists a field comparatively untilled which they might cultivate and sow as they desired. Unfortunately, the literary men of the time seemed above these mundane things. The poets preferred to soar to realms more fantastically conceived ; if all did not, with Shelley, see life as some blot staining the white radiance of eternity, practically every one abandoned the path indicated by Lillo and chose themes impossibly romantic. They preferred the way of Home and of Jephson.

Home and Jephson had both been deeply influenced by Shakespeare's works, and this Shakespearian influence is the most marked feature of the literary drama during the early nineteenth century. Sometimes it gets confused with the strain of German medievalism—the spectacular thrill of Kotzebue or the sensationalism of Schiller—but everywhere it is apparent. It influences the choice of theme ; it induces repetition of imitated character ; it fetters the dramatists to a blank-verse style which, because no longer in its vigorous youth and mysteriously harmonized to the creative spirit evolving plot and theme, strikes false, shallow, and artificial. This Shakespearian influence is deeply marked, at the very beginning of the century, in the plays of John Tobin, whose The Honey Moon was acted in 1805 and The Curfew in 1807. The plot of the former is a patchwork of ideas taken from The Taming of the Shrew, Twelfth Night, Romeo and Juliet, and Henry IV, with some suggestions filched from Fletcher's Rule a Wife and Have a Wife. Rolando is a poor imitation of Benedick, who, for purposes of variety, is made to love, not a Beatrice, but a Viola, here called Zamora. The way in which this Shakespearian tendency was allied to a tendency in the direction of ' Gothic ' romance is shown by the second play, The Curfew. Gloomy halls and dismal caves, bands of marauding robbers, a stock 'Baron,' appeals to superstitious sentiment, recognitions of long-lost wives and of long-lost sons—all these are introduced into this hotchpotch of romantic imaginings, and are expressed in language which seems an equal mixture of debased Shakespeare and adulterated Fletcher.

BRITISH DRAMA

Typical, too, are the Plays on the Passions, issued in a series of three volumes dated 1798, 1802, and 1812, by Joanna Baillie. These are well-meaning enough; but the path of true drama cannot be paved with good intentions alone. No one now reading these long-forgotten dramas can fail to be impressed by Joanna Baillie's genuine talent for poetic expression. The language rarely sinks to mediocrity, and rises at times to a truly impassioned utterance. Yet the Plays on the Passions are not great tragedies. Joanna Baillie had no real knowledge of the stage, and as a consequence her dramas frequently fail in regard to technique. She was merely a woman of letters condescending to show the theatre what it ought to be; she was not, as every playwright should be, honestly anxious to make herself acquainted with the many requirements of the playhouse. Beyond that, too, her tragedies have their weaknesses. The authoress has gone the wrong way to work. Shakespeare, we may believe, did not say to himself, "I shall write a play on Jealousy," and turn out Othello, or "I shall write a play on Pride," and turn out Lear. The cardinal passion of Shakespeare's dramas is dependent upon the characters and the theme; Joanna Baillie's plays have character and theme dependent on a preconceived passion. This error, it may be noted, was shared by other more distinguished poets: Coleridge's Remorse is a cardinal instance. Moreover, in penning their tragedies the greater dramatists do not limit themselves to one emotion. Joanna Baillie never seems to trust herself to speak of pride when her theme is jealousy, or to speak of hate when her theme is ambition. She has successfully documented men's emotions, boxed them up in nice little romantic caskets, to be opened one at a time with excessive care. Still further, Joanna Baillie's plays display marked crudities. Her love of murder as a dramatic device makes many of her situations monotonously stereotyped, and her weakness for revealing to the spectators or readers the whole development of the plot in her first act renders the latter portions of her tragedies uninteresting. The only one of her plays which won any sort of success on the stage was De Montfort (acted 1800), and that moderate success the authoress owed apparently less to her own genius than to a wonderful piece of stage-carpentry by which the theatre was turned into a fourteenth-century church magnificently decorated.

THE LITERARY DRAMA

Of the several members of the early or 'Wordsworth' group of romantic poets, all tried their hands at play-writing. Of these, Robert Southey, because of the immense influence he exerted on the others, may first be mentioned. His dramas all belong to the early pantisocracy period, when his heart was thrilled by visions of a millennium heralded by the French Revolution. The Fall of Robespierre. An historic drama, written in collaboration with Coleridge, appeared in 1794, and Wat Tyler ; a Dramatic Poem, was issued surreptitiously by his enemies in 1817, when its author had long left his youthful republican sentiments and had turned to Toryism instead. Both of these are pitiful enough, and the latter reads almost as if it were a parody of sentimental, humanitarian melodrama. They probably aid in indicating another weakness in the nineteenth-century poetic drama. All the poets of the time were doctrinaire ; they sometimes seemed to abandon the bare slopes of Parnassus in order to preach pathetically from somewhat rickety pulpits. They loved to make their poems didactic. Didacticism may be a very honourable thing in its own way, but to the drama it must be anathema. The playwright may show his opinions indirectly, if he pleases ; he may state a problem or lay open some festering social sore ; but as soon as he begins to use his plays as if they were sermons, and his theatre as if it were the church, he inevitably fails.

A trifle more successful was Samuel Taylor Coleridge in his Remorse (1813), a revised version of the early Osorio, which had been sent to Sheridan as early as 1797 and impolitely refused. Remorse reminds us somewhat of Joanna Baillie's productions. Don Alvar is the upright hero of the play, whose life is plotted against by his evil brother, Ordonio. After a thrilling series of adventurous actions, in the course of which the honest Moor, Isidore, and Ordonio are slaughtered, Alvar throws off his disguise, and the whole ends on a moderately happy note. There is little universality in the work, and rarely if ever do we thoroughly associate ourselves with the characters. In general atmosphere this play shows clearly the influence of German romantic dramas, the theme of two brothers, one of whom is honest and the other evil-minded, bearing a close resemblance to the then popular story of Schiller's Die Räuber.

BRITISH DRAMA

Some of the same defects may be traced in the pessimistic Borderers (written 1795-6) of William Wordsworth. This play even more than Osorio may be traced in inception to a Schillerian source. The crime committed with the best-intentioned motives is clearly a legacy of the German drama, but Wordsworth has nothing of Schiller's power over dramatic form. Touches of character-delineation there are in Marma-duce and Oswald, but never carried out to fullness, so that the personages of the tragedy remain without life. The plot is chaotically constructed, and the author is led to pour forth in unrestrained narrative pages of blank verse in his most uninspired strain.

Sir Walter Scott too tried his hand at drama. His studies in German literature led him early to write his rather pedestrian rendering of Götz von Berlichingen, and from that he turned to more original composition in The House of Aspen (printed 1830). This latter work is thoroughly in the German style, and can take rank only with the spectacular plays of The Castle Spectre class. Nowhere in it does the author of Waverley show that power which was to make him one of the greatest literary figures in Europe.

Other writers of the time fondly hoped for success in the theatrical world. Charles Lamb, who furnished Coleridge with the prologue for Remorse, attempted a tragedy in John

THE LITERARY DRAMA

Woodvil, to which was given originally the title of Pride's Cure (written 1799 ; printed 1802). This tragedy, which Lamb submitted unthanked to Kemble, again displays well the weakness of the poetic drama of the time. Poetry there is in it, with, as might have been expected, numerous reminiscences of the Elizabethan dramatists, but of co-ordinated central power it has none, and the characterization is, at best, mere sketchy patchwork.

When we come to the later or 'Byron' group of romantic authors there is an equal attention paid to drama. Byron himself left a series of dramas, some of which were acted ; Shelley gave us The Cenci and Prometheus Unbound ; Keats penned his Otho the Great.

Of Keats' effort, executed in collaboration with Armitage Brown, not much need be said. It was apparently composed in the year 1819, and actually was accepted for production at Drury Lane, although it was never produced. The story is not an interesting one, and the characterization is weak. The scene is set in the Dark Ages. Conrad, the villain, reunited in friendship to Otho, weds his sister, Auranthe, to the latter's son, Ludolph. The maiden, however, has, in order to shield her own stained honour, slandered the innocent Erminia, whose lack of guilt is attested to by the monk Ethelbert and by Albert. In the end Auranthe dies, and Ludolph goes mad. The purposes of the characters do not always seem plain, and the verse, contrary to what might have been expected, is of a somewhat lumbering nature. Here, decidedly, Keats displays none of his genius.

Shelley's The Cenci (1819) deserves more careful notice. It is certainly true that this is one of the most striking tragedies among the many poetic plays of the century, but we must guard against overrating it because of the general level of dramatic mediocrity. Assuredly we may find in it many defects, defects due to the lyrical tendencies of the author and to his lack of theatrical knowledge. Many passages seem to be dramatically unnecessary, and at times the wealth of language makes the action drag. Even beyond this we may question whether The Cenci actually succeeds in its aim. Beatrice Cenci is obviously the central figure, but, in reading as on the stage, she somehow fails to convince us. Her uncompromising denial of complicity in the murder of her father seems to us not in harmony with her character as displayed in the first acts and at the end of the play. It seems here as if Shelley had been misled by his own idealistic visions. For him Beatrice's pollution was a merely earthly thing; it did not, or should not, have affected the freedom of her mind. Had she been perfect, therefore, she ought to have allowed her father's crime to go unavenged. As it was, Shelley evidently desired to display in her a fatal flaw, which took form in her desire for vengeance. So soon as she had given way to that desire, evil impulses came upon her, and her character weakened. The tragedy, therefore, appears to be set on a plane too high above this earth. For the ordinary reader or spectator Beatrice's ἀμαρτία is unintelligible, few being able to soar with the author of the "Ode to the West Wind" to the idealistic realms where his airy spirit found a home and resting-place. This defect in The Cenci is greater than that commonly adduced, the ghastliness of the plot. Certainly the theme possesses a horror which even fine acting cannot dispel, but this we might have forgiven had the purposes of the characters been thoroughly intelligible. The greatest drama is idealistic in essence, but fundamentally it lays its basis in the common aspirations and passions of mankind.

BRITISH DRAMA

Among the various poets of this period Lord Byron comes nearest to success in the world of drama. His plays are not only more numerous than those of the others; they possess greater power and reveal a surer knowledge of theatrical technique. The dramas of this author commence with Manfred (1817), and continue through Marino Faliero, Sardanapalus, The Two Foscari, and Cain (all 1821), to Werner (acted 1830). All of these reveal the presence of a creative spirit at once more in touch with ordinary life and more tragically majestic than may be found in any of the other poets. The Romantic writers habitually put themselves forward in their dramas, but not Coleridge, Shelley, or Keats could have been a tragic hero. Byron, however, is shaped in that mould from which issued forth, more than two centuries previously, the tremendous heroes of Christopher Marlowe. Like Faustus and Tamburlaine, Byron had colossal aspirations; as with them the universe, and the universe alone, took toll of his too great human presumption. The creator of Childe Harold and of Don Juan had in him the stuff of which great drama is made. Manfred, perhaps, is the weakest of all his plays, although nowhere has Byron so fully expressed his misanthropic hatred of man and his appreciation of the grandeur of Nature's solitary spaces. With Manfred must be associated Werner; or, The Inheritance, dedicated to Goethe and clearly influenced both by Götz von Berlichingen and by Die Räuber. In this drama Siegendorf is shown to us, disguised as Werner, stranded in a decayed palace in Silesia. His arch-enemy, Stralenheim, suddenly arrives in the same spot. In his poverty the former, through a secret passage, goes and robs the latter, and a soldier called Gabor is accused of the crime. In order to save the man whom he knows to be innocent Werner places this soldier in the concealed passage. Meanwhile events have developed. Ulric is discovered to be Werner's son; in hatred he murders Stralenheim, and Gabor is now supposed to have been the assassin. Werner makes efforts to discover him, but when he is found the guilt of Ulric is shown. Tragic emotion thus results from the pride and passion of Werner and from the contortion of family hate inherited by his son, Ulric. At the same time Byron has been extraordinarily restrained in his treatment of the theme. Sardanapalus too is interesting dramatically. The character of the hero, effeminate yet capable of heroic action, and that of Myrrha are excellently portrayed. Yet, imaginatively powerful as these plays are, and possessing genuine dramatic qualities, there is something which we feel to be lacking in them. Byron has the creative power, but we have the impression that his tragedies, instead of being great, merely might have been great. Byron may have a personality more humanly appealing than had Shelley or Wordsworth, but his over-emphasized subjectivity becomes monotonous in the end, and, close to life though he was, we feel in him too the note of superiority and disdain with which the poets of the time regarded the contemporary theatre and its ragged regiments of melodramatists.

THE LITERARY DRAMA

BRITISH DRAMA

Apart from the major poets of the early nineteenth century there were several littérateurs who endeavoured to convince the audiences of their worth and who were successively hailed by the critics as prophets of a new age. Of these Charles Robert Maturin won much transitory fame with his Bertram (1816), produced by Kean at the solicitation of Lord Byron and countenanced by Scott. This play, as well as the showy Manuel (1817) and Fredolfo (1819), is marked by a keen sense of word-beauty, but the excessive sentimentality and pathos introduced into every scene render all these works of minor dramatic importance. So, too, failed Richard Lalor Sheil, who tried to capture the stage by storm, heaping excess upon excess in wild confusion. Adelaide (1816) is a typically scened Germanized play which deals with the subject of the French Revolution, and The Apostate (1817) is full of grandiloquent passages which occasionally rise to tragic heights, but which more often sink to bathos. Sheil's tendencies are shown in the fact that for his Evadne, or, The Statue (1819), he went to the Elizabethan Shirley for his plot. Sometimes this author comes as near as any of his contemporaries to the securing of a truly dramatic note, yet none of his plays, with their admixture of Elizabethan, romantic, and 'Germanic' elements, can make any stir in our hearts to-day.

Henry Hart Milman was another of these. His Fazio (1816) was designed as an "attempt at reviving our old national drama with greater simplicity of plot," but it fails in its effort through its rather rambling blank verse and its want of intensity. The plot is a peculiar one, concerned mainly with the alchemist Fazio, in whose house Bartolo, an old miser, dies. The former seizes his bag of gold and then pretends he has found the philosophers' stone. In his newly won riches he pays attention to the Marchesa Aldabella, and his wife, Bianca, in a fit of jealousy declares to the authorities that her husband was the murderer of Bartolo. He is hanged, and she dies of a broken heart.

THE LITERARY DRAMA

As is evident, the theme is hardly one fitted for genuine tragic treatment. For the subject-matter of his Ivan (1816) William Sotheby went to Russia. This is a poorly wrought drama of palace intrigue and of would-be philosophical sentiment—typical, in its lack of co-ordinated impression, of so many tragedies of the time. More effective proved the few tragedies of Mary Russell Mitford, Julian (1823), The Foscari (1826), and Rienzi (1828). All of these possess individuality and a few effective scenes, but again there is nothing new, nothing great, nothing strong.

For a time it seemed as though one writer were to succeed in drawing the literary drama out of the general rut of mediocrity or incompetence, but when we now look back on the plays of this author—James Sheridan Knowles—we realize that he too had nothing fresh to give to the theatre of his period. More than most of his companions, he was prepared to utilize devices rendered popular in the hands of the melodramatists; he had sufficiently lofty ideals of a critical kind to keep him steady in his aim; he had grasped something of the middle-class demands of the contemporary audiences. An examination of his plays, however, shows that, with all this, he had nothing fundamentally novel to present. Virginus (1820) is merely a bourgeois rendering of classic story; William Tell (1825) is only a superior melodrama; The Wife: A Tale of Mantua (1833) is hopelessly artificial in its romantic fashion, with long-lost loves miraculously revealed in time-honoured fashion. Some interestingly drawn characters he has to give, but these alone cannot lift his plays to a higher plane. He sometimes comes near to fuller achievement, but never is there for him complete success.

The attempts thus made in the first few years of the century were energetically followed by various writers of later decades. Walter Savage Landor, not with much dramatic skill, early essayed tragedy in Count Julian (1812), and again, a quarter of a century after, in Andrea of Hungary and Giovanna of Naples (1839) and in The Siege of Ancona (1846). No more significant were the various plays written by his brother, Robert Eyres Landor, whose The Count

BRITISH DRAMA

Arezzi (1824) betrays some of the same kind of confusion as had marred Count Julian. Thomas Noon Talfourd came closer to the theatre with his Ion (1836), a play hailed by many as the long-awaited drama destined to lead men toward a new world. This work, however, no more than the others may hold our attention now. Talfourd's love of the classics gives it a certain dignity and perhaps a certain grandeur, but the characters are chilly conceived, and the language drags monotonously on, stilted and artificial, leading to soliloquies such as the following :

Ion. Distrust me not.—Benignant Powers, I thank ye !

[Exit.

Adrastus. Yet stay—he's gone—his spell is on me yet ;
What have I promised him ? To meet the men
Who from my living head would strip the crown,
And sit in judgment on me ?—I must do it—
Yet shall my band be ready to o'erawe
The course of liberal speech, and if it rise
So as too loudly to offend my ear,
Strike the rash brawler dead !—What idle dream
Of long-past days had melted me ? It fades—
It vanishes—I am again a King !

No more ardent vitality could he infuse into romantic themes ; his later Glencoe ; or, The Fate of the Macdonalds (1840), although it travels to the Highlands for its setting and treats of a story of tragic love, presents as lifeless characters and as frigid artificiality.

Variously these literary authors played with their romantic visions, but always they chose plot material either from past ages or from their own imaginative dream-worlds ; their blank verse meandered through 'classic' or Shakespearian meadows, but never took on the vividness of pulsating dramatic expression. The great poets no farther than the lesser men of letters advanced the position of the true drama of their time. Thus Robert Browning, who at first might be deemed gifted with just such qualities as befitted a genuine dramatist, failed with the rest. Here, it might have been thought, was one at least who loved not merely to elaborate melodious cadences on which the ear soon surfeits or to persist in dull repetitions of Shakespearian phraseology; here was one with a knowledge of men, a dominant will, and a love of reality; here was one who in his mid-career created his famous gallery of "Men and Women." Undoubtedly Browning was the one best qualified of all these poets (unless we except Byron) to pen successful tragedies, but several things prevented him from reaching perfection in this art. His love of the soliloquy which makes the Dramatis Personæ such a magnificent series of dramatic lyrics renders his plays somewhat slow in movement. His passion for truth in language, which enabled him to compose verses of a peculiarly concentrated and significant emotional intensity, marred his dialogue; the language of drama must be realistic, but whenever it becomes obscure action at once begins to flag. Nor were his characters dramatically planned. Browning loved the odd, the peculiar, the extraordinary, and in his tragedies he was inclined to centre attention on these oddities and let the more commonplace pass by him. Hamlet may be in this way a peculiar character, but beside him the very ordinary Horatio is fully delineated.

THE LITERARY DRAMA

Browning's introduction to the world of drama came through a request of Macready's that the young poet of Paracelsus should write something for him. Strafford was the answer to this request, a play which Macready dutifully produced in 1837, but which soon had to be put aside. There are elements of greatness in Strafford, but the whole of the dialogue is too rhetorical, and the characters, although well delineated, do not seem to move. The chaotic splendour of Sordello intervened between this play and Browning's next efforts, King Victor and King Charles (1842) and The Return of the Druses (1843). Pippa Passes, issued in 1841, can barely be called a play. King Victor is one of Browning's best-wrought pieces. Confining himself to four characters, he has succeeded in gaining a concentration of passion and energy which is lacking in Strafford. The conclusion is the only part of the drama which seems to take away from its greatness. The theme is a simple one. In a moment of political crisis the resolute and somewhat treacherous Victor gives over his throne to his son Charles, and the latter, who is whelmed in a series of conflicting doubts and purposes, grants it back to his father when the latter lies on his death-bed. Polyxena, Charles' wife, is the most interesting figure in the play, a fine portrait of "noble and right woman's-manliness," the expression of Browning's own ideal, and D'Ormea is an able study of a political minister. The Return of the Druses is somewhat more melodramatic and seems to go back to earlier romantic sentiment for its inspiration. Here the scene is an island in the Southern Sporades, inhabited by a Syrian race called the Druses. They are under the domination of the Templars. The tragic conflict arises from the fact that, goaded into rebellion by the tyranny of the old Prefect, these Druses accept Djabal as a god reincarnated to free them from oppression, while the mild Loys, an honest member of his order, is striving to release them from bondage. Conflict arises in Loys' mind through his love of Anael, the betrothed of Djabal, and Djabal himself is an interesting study of the born chieftain who, in order to secure his end, pretends to divine attributes. The scene in which Loys discovers Djabal's duplicity is masterly, but once more the drama as a whole is actionless, and obscure phraseology frequently disturbs the treatment of the emotional conflict. A Blot in the 'Scutcheon (1843) betrays some of the same features. There are many scenes in it which are dramatically effective, but much of the language is obscure. A poor welcome was given to this play, as also to Colombe's Birthday (printed 1844; acted 1853). In this drama one character, that of Valence, stands forward as a majestic figure; but rhetoric again clogs the action. Luria and A Soul's Tragedy (1846) are, like Pippa Passes, written in a form unsuitable for stage production.

BRITISH DRAMA

Browning, then, failed in this attempt to provide a great drama for his times. So, too, but in different ways, failed Thomas Lovell Beddoes, Charles Jeremiah Wells, and Richard Henry Horne. Beddoes had a true eye for the defects of his age. "The man who is to awaken the drama," he wrote in 1825, "must be a bold, trampling fellow. . . . With the greatest reverence for all the antiquities of the drama I still think that we had better beget than revive—attempt to give the literature of this age an idiosyncrasy and spirit of its own.” This, however, he himself was not capable of doing. In spite of the fact that he did succeed in suggesting a new development of blank-verse dramatic dialogue, his themes are of the old age, not of the new. His imagination is gloomy, his visions macabre; the true expression of his genius is to be found in that strange work entitled Death's Jest Book (completed in its first form 1826; printed 1850), where lyrics of a delicate and fragile loveliness clash with language at times powerfully and crudely passionate. His The Bride's Tragedy (1822) is immature and over-redolent of the Elizabethans. Of a similar type is Charles Jeremiah Wells' single effort, Joseph and his Brethren, originally published in 1824 and frequently revised up to 1879. Flashes of lurid light glance through this play, which critics are not far wrong in tracing back to the spirit of Marlowe. The last of this trio is Richard Henry Horne, author of Cosmo de Medici (1837), The Death of Marlowe (1837), Gregory VII (1840), and Judas Iscariot (1848). Had these plays been written in 1600 we should probably now esteem them as among the best works of the Elizabethan dramatists, but their spirit is wholly out of touch with the time in which they were written. Majestic conceptions are in them and a rich rush of gorgeous poetry, but they betray the same weakness visible in all the poetic plays of the Romantic period; they give nothing new to the theatre. Fundamentally they are but imitations of the grandeur of earlier dramatic activity.

320

THE LITERARY DRAMA

Considerable space might be given to many other writers of similar poetic plays during the Byron period, but these may serve as typical of the general productivity. In nearly every drama there are brilliant scenes, in each there is some beauty of language and occasional flashes of insight into human character at times of emotional stress. Many show able imitations of early Elizabethan dramatic activity, and strength, sometimes of a titanic nature, is not lacking. We seem to see that here the theatre might have gained a new life, had its doors not been shut to the numerous poets clamouring for entrance. At the same time, these poets in reality could not have brought to the playhouse anything save old themes treated in a finer way. Romance coloured their lives, and they knew not how to delve below into the sorrows of ordinary existence. What the theatre wanted was the impulse that comes from reality, an impulse that ere long was to proceed from Scandinavia, and the theatre, had it welcomed the poets on to its stage, fostering thus another Elizabethan period, might well have hindered rather than furthered the remarkable revival of dramatic work which characterizes our own period.

BRITISH DRAMA

CHAPTER III

MELODRAMAS AND FARCES

NONE of the plays noted in the last chapter gave anything new ; none met the requirements of the time. More characteristic of the period are the various dramatic romances and melodramas which formed the regular stock-in-trade of the theatres. These may be entirely innocent of literary graces, they may not offer to us much of promise for the future ; but they at least had vigour, interest, and vitality. In the works of Home and of Jephson, still more in the bizarre plays of Matthew Gregory ('Monk') Lewis, a general native tendency toward the melodrama may be discerned in the last years of the eighteenth century, but the formal establishment of that type on the London stage unquestionably owes much to Continental, particularly to German, example. During the last years of the eighteenth century the influence of France suddenly disappeared, and all eyes were turned to the genius of Northern Europe. For this there were several reasons. Novelty, certainly, was in this change of orientation. The Parisian theatre had been well ransacked, and here was virgin soil for the dramatic plunderers. Politically, too, Germany was more desirable to deal with. The Germans were soon to become our allies ; our ruling dynasty was German. France was now a republic, and the excesses of the revolutionaries were turning almost all men against her. Above all, Germany had that to provide for which all Europe was craving, a distinctly individual note in the theatre. Lessing had proved himself the only man in Europe with a true idea of what the drama implied, and had already made fresh essays in the domestic tragedy. Goethe had produced his Götz von Berlichingen, starting thereby a whole school of medievalism. Schiller had written, in Die Räuber, one of the most distinctive of eighteenth-century plays, and even to Kotzebue, condemned as he is to-day, may be given the credit of establishing in his Menschenhass und Reue, his Falsche Scham and other similar works, a more pronounced form of drame than so far had been attempted. Small wonder was it, then, that the English dramatists turned to these men, and our only regret can be that they did not follow more firmly Lessing's and Schiller's lead. From Germany they took only external things. They seized upon Kotzebue's sentimentalism rather than on Schiller's tragic tone. They misunderstood their originals and made spectacular that which had possessed true elements of greatness.

BRITISH DRAMA

The earliest adaptation of a German work seems to have been Johnstone's The Disbanded Officer (1786), a rendering of Lessing's Minna von Barnhelm; within a few years of that date the London bookshops were literally full of translations and adaptations from Lessing, from Kotzebue, from Schiller, from Iffland, from Kratter, from Goethe, and even other lesser and now long-forgotten authors. From Germany, too, more adventurous writers passed to other lands, the first rendering from the Danish appearing in Wilson's Poverty and Wealth (1799).

Among these authors three distinct strains of feeling can be traced. The first of these is the sentimentalism marked in the works of Kotzebue, and, akin to that, the deeper humanitarianism of Goethe. The second is the medieval atmosphere as expressed in the latter author's Götz von Berlichingen, which was translated by Sir Walter Scott in 1799. The third is the richer dramatic force in Schiller's dramas. It must be admitted that the majority of these translations were reading plays, never actually performed upon the stage, and that their influence was probably greater on the poetic closet drama of England than upon the theatre. At the same time, they aided in moulding and forming all the dramatic literature of the early nineteenth century. Kotzebue laid his spell upon the English playwrights, and taught them how to express new problems. Goethe aided in the development of medievalism, and Schiller gave new types and scenes. The French correctness and the French sentimentalism had gone. Instead of extolling the beauties of the Gallic tongue, the translator of The Robbers (1792) could declare that "the French language in point of energy is far inferior to our own tongue, and very far beneath the force of the German." The whirligig of time brought its revenges, and Gothicism reigned in the world of poetry and drama.

MELODRAMAS AND FARCES

This Gothicism reigned because it met with, and found spiritual kinship in, a vague, indeterminate, but nevertheless forceful native tendency which was ultimately leading to the same goal. The spirit of sentimentalism was more serious than comic; it is by no means difficult to see how the sentimentalized hero of Steele's The Conscious Lovers is passed on and, subtly transformed, becomes the hero, eager to rescue innocence in distress, of such a play as Morton's Speed the Plough, hovering on the borderline of serious comedy and frank melodrama. Easy, too, is it to trace the gradual development from the Grecian palace setting of Home's The Fatal Discovery to the dingy caverns, the mouldering graves, and the rococo ruined castles of the last years of the eighteenth century. The sentimentalism, the medieval atmosphere, and the bold treatment of unusual themes were all apparent in England before ever Kotzebue and Schiller reached our shores; only, Kotzebue and Schiller had succeeded in making a few paces ahead of the English writers, and so, by their influence and encouragement, hastened on a process already well advanced.

In tracing this movement, besides the formal translations primarily intended for a reading public only, we must take into account a few adaptations and imitations which, as it were, paved the way for the more popular melodramatists to come. This transitional stage is well enough marked in Sheridan's famous reworking of Kotzebue's Pizarro (1799), which, spectacular and thrilling as it may be, is designed as a regular tragedy. Pizarro, however, though it may have won more popular esteem than the others, by no means stood alone, nor was it the earliest of its kind. Five years before, James Boaden in Fontainville Forest (1794) had produced a similar kind of play with a ruined Gothic abbey setting and action placed in the fifteenth century. In this abbey Lamotte, poverty-stricken, has taken refuge. Walking in the wood one day, he hears cries of terror and arrives in time to save Adeline, whom he takes back to his wife. Driven to despair by hunger, he waylays the Marquis of Montault. The latter, visiting the abbey, finds in Lamotte the highwayman who had assaulted him, and forgives him only on condition that he attempts to persuade Adeline to become his mistress. Suddenly, however, this evil Marquis discovers that the maiden is none other than the daughter of his own brother, whom long since he had murdered. His crime is revealed, and he commits suicide. The play has all the trappings dear to the heart of romance—the ancient abbey, the theme of robbery, a ghost in a darkened room, and a long-concealed murder startlingly exposed.

BRITISH DRAMA

This type of drama continued its successful career throughout the first decades of the nineteenth century. It is impossible here to trace its career in detail ; two representative examples only may be selected to present some idea of the general scope of the kind. The first of these is The Iron Chest (1796), a popular piece by George Colman the Younger. The source of this work is William Godwin's novel Caleb Williams, and it employs liberally a series of exciting and grotesque incidents calculated to capture the attention of a not too exacting audience. Sir Edward Mortimer in this play is head-keeper of the New Forest. Some time previously he has been tried on a charge of murder, but had come from the court acquitted. Wilford learns his secret, and Sir Edward, thinking to get rid of him, accuses him of robbery. Wilford, however, being the hero, is successful in his project, and Sir Edward's guilt is proved by an unlucky document preserved in an iron chest. There is here a typical melodramatic story of concealed crime, including a villain and a distressed hero cut to measure. The other representative piece of the same kind is William Dimond's The Foundling of the Forest (1809). Here Baron Longueville is the villain. He loves Geraldine, daughter of De Valmont, and tries, to reach his end, to murder Florian, the foundling. His plot fails ; and meanwhile it is discovered that De Valmont's long-lost wife still lives. Bertrand, Longueville's tool, is smitten with conscience, and through his means it is discovered that Florian is De Valmont's son. Again a common story of criminal purpose and distressed virtue all duly coming right in the end.

MELODRAMAS AND FARCES

It is evident that here stock characters and stock characters only are being utilized ; that sentimental considerations dominate in the minds of the dramatists ; that the thrill of past ages is being fully exploited ; that the old decorum of the pseudo-classic tragedy is being supplanted by a frank introduction of violent action and exciting episode. Soon the demand for such plays increased, particularly so when the 'minor' theatres of the nineteenth century—that is, those theatres which had sprung up alongside the major, patent theatres—discovered that, although they were debarred by law from presenting regular comedy and tragedy with spoken dialogue, they might produce pieces of this kind provided only that some sort of musical accompaniment were introduced. These plays were spectacularly artificial, and the introduction of music was not likely to interfere with their appeal ; indeed, the music, varied, as the stage-directions inform us, with 'solemn,' 'horrid,' or 'lamenting' notes, was brought to play its part in the creation of atmosphere. The 'minor' theatres appealed to a popular audience ; their system was the repertory system with constant change of bill ; the audiences were continually clamouring for novelties—hence there was a constant demand for new pieces in this style. For their part, the 'minor' dramatists found, first, that the pay was small for such pieces and that, if they desired to make a living wage, they had to turn out dozens of plays in the year, and, second, that their way was made the easier for them by the facts that no literary graces were demanded and that action appealed to the audiences even more than spoken dialogue. Thus, as we watch the progress of the melodrama through the succeeding years we find a constant retrogression so far as style is concerned and an increasing tendency to substitute lengthy stage-direction descriptive of physical action for dialogue expressive of character. Necessarily, as this tendency developed, there came an increasing cleavage between the superior poetic dramatists and these shamelessly unliterary playwrights.

BRITISH DRAMA

Thus was the melodrama established, and thus it ran its course during the nineteenth century. Melodramas, however, were not all of one sort. Certain fundamental characteristics are to be discovered in each example of the kind, whether that belongs to 1820 or to 1860 ; but it is important to observe particularly the development of new themes corresponding to changes of taste in the audiences of the different periods. At the beginning the melodramatic plots were taken either from romantic tales of adventure or from stories of supernatural wonders. They provided, in other words, the crude counterpart of the romantic imaginings which produced, in vastly different spheres of literary creation, such works as Thalaba, The Rime of the Ancient Mariner, Isabella, The Revolt of Islam, and The Corsair. Men like ' Monk ' Lewis early exploited the romantic passion for the other world (as in The Castle Spectre, 1798), and were succeeded by a train of worthy followers ; others, such as Dimond and the Dibbins, ransacked the Middle Ages for suitable themes ; still others, such as William Thomas Moncrieff in The Cataract of the Ganges ; or, The Rajah's Daughter (1822), turned hopefully to the East. Very soon the constant seeking for new plots led these men to the rapidly flourishing world of contemporary fiction. Sir Walter Scott, they discovered, wrote on themes which, if stripped of the strength and beauty of their style, could be adapted easily to melodramatic requirements. Thus in Rob Roy they found the stock bandit of sympathetic heart, driven to theft and rapine by the oppression of the great ; they found there a hero in young Osbaldistone ; they found a graceful heroine (with the usual secret) in Diana Vernon and a thorough villain in Rashleigh Osbaldistone. Since there was no dramatic copyright in those days, the melodramatists were free to use this heaven-sent material as much as they desired. Hearts of Midlothian throbbed on every stage.

Partly through this delving into the world of fiction, partly because of changing tastes in the age, an alteration in the choice of melodramatic themes becomes apparent during the thirties and forties of the century. Having ransacked Scott, the 'minor' playwrights quite naturally looked back to the fiction-writers of the preceding years. They tried their hand at Fielding and Smollett, and discovered in Defoe an author who, because of his love of action, well suited their purposes. But when one of them had turned, say, Moll Flanders into a play, and when others followed with kindred picaresque themes (such as B. N. Webster with his Paul Clifford, the Highwayman of 1770 (1832)) it was found that a nearer approach toward contemporary life appeared here than in the romantic or bizarre stories hitherto utilized. Through these the way was paved for the introduction to the stage of the 'naturalistic' melodrama. This achieved its greatest impetus through the dramatization of Dickens' novels. These, full of action, character, and exciting incident, were avidly seized on. The proof-sheets were snatched as they came wet from the press; as many as half a dozen separate dramatic versions of one of his novels were produced within a week of its publication. Through such plays the public became accustomed to see depicted before them, in the now time-honoured melodramatic way, scenes of a familiar cast; they sobbed over little Nell and outrageously hissed poor Scrooge, discovering a novel and added excitement because little Nell was nearer to them than a shadowy Adeline and Scrooge a more potent villain than a nebulous Marquis of Montault.

MELODRAMAS AND FARCES

From this it was but a step to the sentimental depiction of all kinds of life—mostly lower-class life—known to the spectators. Usually—for action and thrill were demanded as essentials—the themes had some background of crime, war, or rebellion, and, as the century advanced, more and more ingenuity was displayed in treating themes likely to appeal to the popular audiences. Dickens having been fully exploited, the actual occurrences of the day were put upon the stage; there Sweeny Todd recommitted his crimes and Maria Marten nightly pursued her dismal career. The introduction of this domestic melodrama, allied to the effects produced by the truly epoch-making Theatre Act of 1843, soon brought something new. When the minor dramatists turned from the Middle Ages, the East, and the realm of the supernatural to the common themes of daily existence, quite naturally they began to lose some of their artificiality of style and proceeded to think of ways suited for the securing of naturalistic impressions. Sometimes they seemed unable to imagine any means better than the introduction on the stage of familiar objects—street-lamps, hansom-cabs, and, later, actual weapons used for their crimes by the criminals who were chosen as the protagonists of their plays; but gradually an appreciation of subtler methods dawned on their minds, and their technique was improved. Fuller 'realism,' of course, could not be developed out of the melodramatic style, but in these plays a step at least was being taken toward the dramatists of 1890-1920. The importance of this preliminary work must not be minimized, and, even although we may recognize that realism cannot lead to high artistry, we may welcome this movement toward a naturalistic stage after the long-enduring excesses of the romantic generations and the chill rhetoric of the literary drama. This movement toward a more natural mode of expression was the direct result of developments within the melodramatic form, but it was aided considerably by the theatrical changes which followed the Act of 1843. Immediately, perhaps, no fundamental consequence of this Act is to be traced; for a time theatres seemed to continue on the time-honoured paths; but eventually the breaking down of the strict cleavage between major and minor playhouses came to have clearly distinguishable influence. The melodramas took on a more literary quality, and the literary drama tended to become more popular.

BRITISH DRAMA

The melodramatic works of such men as Tom Taylor and Charles Reade thus possess a strength lacking in earlier examples of this kind. Sometimes, it is true—for example in Two Loves and a Life (1854), written by these two authors in collaboration—they might choose themes of a romantic sort; this drama thus deals with the rising of 1745 and shows how Ruth, having aided the Duke of Cumberland, succeeds in saving the unfortunate hero, Gervase, from execution. Most characteristic, however, of their style are the melodramas written on domestic themes. Taylor's Still Waters Run Deep (1855) treats of the rascalities of "Captain" Hawksley; the same author's The Ticket-of-leave Man (1863) is a pure detective drama which traces the fortunes of poor Brierly, who is nearly engulfed in disaster through the threats of his former associates. Even Henry Arthur Jones could patronize this form, and in The Silver King (1882) produce a melodrama which, in spite of many artificialities, has an absorbing interest and a genuine vitality.

MELODRAMAS AND FARCES

While the melodrama thus pursued an independent course, various developments are to be observed from about the year 1840 onward, tending toward a corresponding popularization of the literary form. Already in 1838 Lord Lytton had brought The Lady of Lyons before the public, and in 1841 appeared Dion Boucicault's London Assurance. Each of these is important in its own way. Through Lytton's effort the littérateurs were taught how to make their works more suited for ordinary consumption. The Lady of Lyons is a 'literary' play in one sense of the phrase, but its story has the true melodramatic tinge, and most traces of stylistic affectation have vanished. Lytton's later comedy of Money (1840) is even more positive in its significance. Here a theme of genuine immediate interest has been chosen. The audience in the mid-nineteenth-century theatre was largely middle-class, and this story of 'money' proved that Lytton, unlike the other literary dramatists, was aware of the fact that these spectators were clamouring for a comedy and a tragedy expressive of their own conditions. Boucicault's plays too deal with social life of the period. London Assurance aims at depicting the manners of the metropolis, and The School for Scheming (1847) embraces within its sphere the fashions of the aristocracy, the ambitions of the merchant classes, the virtues of the poor. Boucicault is a sentimentalist; his dialogue often sounds to us now stilted and artificial; but he had a true sense of the theatre. These early works of his are by no means to be despised, and his later efforts, in which his genuine sense of humour is ably allied to his appreciation of theatric thrill, were quite justifiably esteemed in his own time. The Colleen Bawn (1859), Arrah-na-Pogue; or, The Wicklow Wedding (1864), The Shaughraun (1874), The O'Dowd (1873), and Cuish-ma-Chree (1887) may merit some of William Archer's condemnation, but they still possess a vitality of their own.

BRITISH DRAMA

While these movements were in progress in the spheres of melodrama and of sentimental comedy, the purely comic theatre, save for one exception, continued to languish. Vapid comic opera and stupid farce for the most part held the boards. The audiences could not appreciate fine wit; rude, primitive, and often coarse physical action took the place of flashing epigram and dazzling metaphor. The exception, however, is important. The early nineteenth-century audiences were not always ignorant of the essential foolishness of the spectacles in which they took delight, and alongside of extravagant melodrama flourished the burlesque. This burlesque in itself has not provided the theatre with any great masterpieces; the innumerable travesties of Hamlet or of contemporary serious dramas are mostly dull and monotonous, while even the more fantastic experiments in this genre of men like Robert Brough are lacking in genuine brilliance; yet this burlesque contributed in its own way to the development of a form of play essentially characteristic of the age and destined to aid in the later development of the theatre. To this form of play is usually given the name 'extravaganza,' and for its popularization in England we have to thank chiefly the prolific James Robinson Planché. Planché started his career with Amoroso, King of Little Britain, in 1818 and continued writing until the second half of the century. His extravaganzas abound in puns; his style is sometimes crude; his ideas are often weak and trivial—but one thing he did achieve. He showed how the romantic love of the wonderful could be turned from an impossible Orientalism and from a medieval atmosphere of ridiculous proportions to a sphere of genuine creativeness. The imaginative quality of the fairy-tale joins in his work with the light touch of burlesque and satire. Olympic Revels; or, Prometheus and Pandora

MELODRAMAS AND FARCES

(1831), with its clever mingling of spectacularism, delicate topical allusions, and parody of classical legend, might well serve as typical of his achievements. Planché himself tells us that he was responsible for altering the methods of costuming in these burlesque pieces ; before his time it had been the custom to dress the characters in as crude and 'vulgar' garments as might be, whereas he demanded for his fairy extravaganzas as rich and as 'historically accurate' dresses as he could devise. This record might, indeed, be regarded as a motto for all his work ; he introduced delicacy and refinement into a dramatic form which before had been but coarsely crude.

The extravaganza thus established by him proved popular, and other authors followed in his footsteps. Robert Brough was one of his earliest successors with his Camaralzaman and Badoura ; or, The Peri who loved a Prince (1848), and he, in turn, passed on the style to H. J. Byron, who cultivated it enthusiastically in the seventies. Its chief importance rests in the fact that the extravaganza proved the basis for the writings of W. S. Gilbert.

So far, wheresoever we look, we find nothing of immediate and paramount importance. The poetic drama is dull and strangely separate from the life of the period ; the melodramatic writers give thrills and excitements in plenty, but rely on cheap effects and trivial dialogue ; the comedies and farces are vulgar and foolish ; even the extravaganza, although it has creative force, does not give us anything of permanent value. In the fifties of the century the stage indeed seemed to have reached a low ebb, yet now, looking back, we are able to discern, in the work of Planché, in that of Lytton and Boucicault, and even in that of the minor melodramatists, something which was to prove the foundation of the modern drama. Before that modern drama could arise the first necessity was the elaboration of a new technique for the stage resultant upon a recognition of changed theatrical conditions, and the second necessity was a still closer amalgamation of popular and literary elements than had hitherto been achieved. For these the way was being prepared in the decades from 1860 to 1890.

PART VI

THE BEGINNINGS OF DRAMATIC REVIVAL (1860-90)

CHAPTER I

CHANGE OF THEATRE, AUDIENCE, AND TONE; IBSEN

THEATRICAL CONDITIONS

IN the year 1873 a reviewer in the Westminster, as H. A. Jones has noted, thought that the drama in England was a defunct art, yet already many steps had been taken toward that revival which, later caught up and elaborated, led to the triumphs of the modern theatre. It is, of course, impossible in the space of this volume to indicate the gradual stages which led to the establishment of the new comedy and of the new tragedy, or to indicate other than briefly the relationship of the English stage of the time to the stages in other countries. For that a survey decade by decade would have been required, so that we might be able to compare, for example, the typical pieces produced in England contemporaneously with such works as Dumas's Demi-Monde in the fifties and such as Meilhac and Halévy's Frou-Frou in the sixties. All that can be done here is to observe some of the major tendencies, noting, in spite of the rapid advance of the theatre when we compare it with the theatre of the eighteenth century, the comparative slowness of progress in England. In this respect Victorian England was in somewhat the same position as Elizabethan England. When Marlowe came to write Tamburlaine the Italians and the French had already achieved much in the theatre; when Robertson produced Society Dumas and Augier had already established themselves; and when the dramatists of the nineties took control Ibsen had made himself an international force.

CHANGES

In order to understand the material conditions operating on the dramatists, we must turn back once more to that which was the most notable theatrical event of the nineteenth century—the Act of 1843 “for regulating” theatres, by which the monopoly of the two patent houses, Covent Garden and Drury Lane, was destroyed, and the way was kept open for the arising of new houses. This Act was partly the result of the gradual financial degeneration of the two larger theatres, for Drury Lane had sunk to such depths that resort was made to shilling concerts in an effort to restore solvency, while Covent Garden had been converted into an opera house; but if the Act was the result partly of the financial condition of the theatres it was none the less dictated largely by a general desire on the part of actors and public to escape from that vastness of structure which had appeared so just and desirable at the close of the eighteenth century. With this legislation of 1843 new theatres could raise their heads in the Metropolis without fear of suppression, and new efforts could be made for the rejuvenation of the playhouse. It is true that at first small signs of alteration are noticeable as we trace the fortunes of the playhouses and of drama in the middle of the nineteenth century. Indeed, for the decades immediately following the date when the Act was passed through Parliament we might imagine that there was even an increase of melodramatic and spectacular pieces. Men were slow to realize the possibilities of the new régime, and so far no inspiration had come to them by which they could rear a new dramatic structure. Gradually, however, the benefits of the alteration in theatrical orientation made their appearance. The smaller theatres that arose to take the place erstwhile occupied by Covent Garden and Drury Lane permitted of the better appreciation of both tragedy and comedy. Actors no longer were forced, as in the larger playhouses, to mouth it grandiloquently, but were enabled to develop subtler and more delicate styles of performance.

To these smaller theatres came, too, a slightly changed audience. Life was not so dissolute as it had been in the early nineteenth century, and Queen Victoria was setting a more sober tone in Court circles. No longer now were the theatres the chosen home of gamblers, rakes, and prostitutes. The middle classes, honest and quiet-minded, came to witness plays in security, unoffended by coarse conversation round them or by missiles playfully flung at spectator or actor. The theatres became more and more houses of artistic endeavour. Perhaps the managers failed often to secure any artistic perfection, but the basis was there for that perfection, as it had not been in the early nineteenth century. With this arising of many new theatres, moreover, it was natural that dramatic styles should come to be associated with particular houses. In the earlier days everything, comedy, tragedy, farce, melodrama, comic opera, extravaganza, burlesque, was mixed up in the two theatres; now, if one theatre specialized in comic opera another could devote itself to more serious drama. This in itself meant that more evenings could be devoted to the higher forms of dramatic literature than was at all possible in the year 1810.

BRITISH DRAMA

Two movements, on the other hand, militated against this system producing the best dramatic work. The first of these, and the most important, was the habit of the long run. Up to the middle of the eighteenth century and even into the nineteenth century runs of any length were unknown. A run of nine nights constituted a record in the early seventeenth century, and the month's performance of The Beggar's Opera in 1728 was regarded as extraordinary. With the coming of new conditions, however, runs became necessary if the managers were not to go bankrupt, and we find the length of these series of performances growing in the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth centuries from weeks to months, until in our own days we look with calm complacency at bills which inform us that this or that piece has run successfully for so many years. In this we are partly suffering for the sins of our fathers, partly we are paying the penalty of a London grown so huge that it is not a town, but a world in itself. The second movement is that wherein the management and ownership of the theatres are affected. When the two houses of Drury

336

CHANGES

Lane and Covent Garden had the monopoly the patents were vested in the hands of one man or of a group of men who engaged managers to undertake the control of the theatres. When the new theatres were built, on the other hand, many were treated as purely speculative ventures on the part of men not in any way interested in the drama. They were erected and promptly let out either to actor-managers or to various companies which gathered together from time to time. Still worse, they were sub-let and sub-sub-let, so that the expenses for the person actually producing the plays rose to a height out of all proportion to what might have been expected. Actor-managers were, and are, thus hampered in their work, and the old stock companies which had done such good all-round work in the eighteenth century virtually disappeared. Apart from the " Old Vic " and Sadler's Wells, the repertory system in our own times is firmly established only in certain more adventurous provincial towns, although on the Continent it is still retained and aids there in the production of good drama.

With this happy event of the liberty of the theatres and the consequent gradual change in the audience must be noted the growth of a new criticism. Instead of the metaphysical meanderings of Coleridge or the sometimes over-enthusiastic comments of Lamb, we find in the second half of the nineteenth century the development of what may fairly be styled scientific criticism. This scientific criticism was precisely what the drama, overburdened already with romantic fervour true and false, required in order that it might rise to some new plane. On the one hand, we note the studies of men like Moulton, who endeavoured to estimate, not Hamlet's psychology, but Shakespeare's dramatic purpose in writing Hamlet; on the other hand, we observe the antiquarian researches into the theatre and its customs which led to Dr W. J. Lawrence's illuminating The Shakespearian Playhouse and Sir E. K. Chambers' The Mediæval Stage and The Elizabethan Stage. For the first time men began to have some ideas concerning the form of Shakespeare's Globe Theatre, and to realize that the theatre as a whole had advanced steadily and logically from medieval times. This led to many consequences. It aided the rising school of dramatists to evolve a new technique. They were able to see why such and such a convention should have been, and why it should now be abandoned. So, too, they were given the materials on which they could base a fresh dramatic theory. Studying Shakespeare in relation to his time and to the conditions under which he worked, they could see more clearly what things in his work presented a message to the modern period, what belonged decisively to his own age and could offer no suggestions to men of their time. Besides this, the antiquarian researches into the form of the medieval and Elizabethan theatres gave new ideas to the actor-managers. They were enabled to secure a fresh orientation, and though the heavily decorated set-pieces of the Lyceum management were most characteristic of this period, soon the question of rich stage decoration versus simplicity came to be put, and men began to wonder whether after all the drama was not most effective when the stage was a bare platform and when the imagination of the spectators was called upon to create visions of leafy forests and palace towers and gloomy dungeons. This question, and questions of a similar nature, gradually led to new endeavours on the part of producers. In the preceding years the manager could think of nothing better than the production of finer, more gorgeous, and more realistic scenery than had been seen before; now he was faced with new worlds, with new ideas, with infinite possibilities of experiment and improvement.

BRITISH DRAMA

(ii) HENRIK IBSEN AND OTHER CONTINENTAL DRAMATISTS

It is evident that the ground was being prepared for the appearance of a fresh literary technique, but no man in England seemed capable of evolving fully the conventions which would harmonize with modern conditions. Possibly such a man might have been forthcoming, but the work of any hypothetical reformer of this sort was anticipated by the appearance in the north of Europe of Henrik Ibsen, destined to become the greatest force in the revival of the present-day theatre. Ibsen started his career as an historical and symbolically fanciful playwright. Lady Inger of Ostråt (1855) is typical of a number of other dramas in which appeal is directed to national sentiments and in which an attempt is made to pen chronicle history. Lady Inger of Ostråt, in spite of the bewildering complexity of the plot, already reveals the presence of a creative master-mind. The dramatic irony of the work is skilfully planned. Lady Inger murders a man, hoping to save her son; her victim turns out to be that very son. Eline is engaged to Nils Lykke; Lykke is found to be the hated betrayer of her sister. From these historical or pseudo-historical themes Ibsen turned to domestic subjects, writing on questions of the present day, exposing in his own stern manner the problems he could see round him everywhere, revealing with sure touch the very innermost of human emotions. An Enemy of the People (1882), The Wild Duck (1884), and Ghosts (1881) are of this class. The first deals with the fate of the benevolent and idealistic Dr Stockmann, who in his zeal becomes the chief object of the people's hatred. It is not a great play, perhaps, but the sure dramatic touches, such as the bringing over of Stockmann's wife in Act III and the ejaculations of the drunken man in Act IV, show what a powerful dramatic artistry Ibsen possessed. In The Wild Duck the plot is more subtle and complicated, and Ibsen appears to be delving into the inner reaches of the soul. The character of Hedvig gradually takes concrete shape before us, as do those of the honest Hjalmar and the younger Werle. The symbolism of The Wild Duck and its pervasive delicacy may be taken as typical of part of Ibsen's work. The sterner side of his nature is revealed in Ghosts. In this drama Ibsen wrote his masterpiece. Nowhere has he so succeeded in revealing at once the problem and the reflection of that problem upon the souls of his characters; nowhere has he so united profound psychological delineation with realistic appeal and interest.

In Ibsen, then, the world found a master-mind, one of these few Übermenschen beloved by Carlyle and by Nietzsche. It is not, however, merely Ibsen's intellectual greatness which makes him occupy his pre-eminent position; it is the fact that his mind was of a sufficient breadth to make for himself his own dramatic world. In consideration of the influence which he exerted on the English dramatists of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries it may be well here briefly to indicate the chief points wherein he opened up new paths to his followers.

BRITISH DRAMA

In the first place, his drama is a domestic drama. Of the old impossible heroics and pathos of the romantic melodrama he knows nothing. His aim is to dramatize the life of his own day. He realized perfectly that the long-antiquated emotions of the spectacular plays had nothing in common with ordinary men and women; that the drama, if it was to rise to its pristine greatness, would have to adapt itself to the needs of the present, be a mirror of the age, and, instead of escaping into romantic fripperies, make itself the stern monitor of the time. In this, as has been seen, Ibsen was anticipated by Heywood in the seventeenth century and by Lillo in the eighteenth, but neither of these had attempted to reveal the fundamental problems of social life. Ibsen wove together the tragedy of the individual soul with the tremendous forces which move in social life like some blind destiny searing and destroying, mankind in their disastrous path seeming no more than an insect fluttering ineffectually against the mighty barriers which loom up against it. In Ibsen we have not merely domestic tragedy, but social tragedy, the forces of life forming dominating dramatis personæ who move unseen across the stage and raise the whole work to the level of the greatest tragic passion.

Nor was this the only thing which Ibsen brought to the theatre. With the treatment of domestic scene and of social problems he introduced a new frankness, which at first grated harshly on the ears of prudish Victorians accustomed to the pleasing commonplaces of Tennysonian melody. Here they found a man who dared to speak of things they deemed unspeakable, who laid bare the most festering sores in the body social, who flinched from nothing in his Olympian grandeur. Soon their detestation of this frankness began to wane. Ghosts, which had been banned by a prurient censorship, was later permitted on the stage, and native writers began to attempt imitations of the Ibsen style. This frankness meant the opening up of new worlds for the dramatists. Not only could they pass from romantic to domestic themes, they could deal with aspects of social life which before had been sternly closed to them; and in dealing with those aspects of social life came to them new ideas and new conceptions of the meaning of the universe.

With this truly epoch-making change in subject-matter and in treatment Ibsen introduced a new technique. He saw that many of the conventions of early nineteenth-century drama were long outworn; he saw that the new theatre demanded a new artistry, and endeavoured to lay the foundations of that artistry. Not only, therefore, did he make of his plays coherent unities, he made them more natural and impressive by his stage methods. The soliloquy and the aside, which had been so useful to romantic dramatists for showing the minds of their villains, he ruthlessly cast aside, substituting therefor a more subtle treatment of dialogue. It is obvious that if a dramatist knows he can make an evil character hiss out his hate or speak his thoughts openly to pit and gallery he will not take such care over his ordinary stage dialogue as he would had these conventions been debarred to him. The change in technique, therefore, led not only to the sweeping away of conventions which had become ridiculous, but also to an added subtlety in presentation of character and of plot.

This subtlety forms another aspect of Ibsen's greatness, but it is one which he shares with the modern theatre in general. The late Professor Vaughan, in his illuminating Types of Tragic Drama, saw clearly that the tendency of dramatic development has been consistently from the less to the more inward; as we watch the progress of tragedy from Æschylus to Shakespeare, from Shakespeare to the writers of the present day, we can witness increasing efforts on the part of the playwrights to subordinate action to thought.

BRITISH DRAMA

Ibsen, representative in his own age of this movement, showed to his contemporaries many methods of securing this inwardness. Already Browning had subordinated action to development of character, but somehow he failed to make the latter sufficiently interesting. Ibsen, by a series of delicate theatrical touches, keeps our attention awake for the appreciation of a drama which is fundamentally static. Nothing really happens in Ghosts; the action is more psychological than physical in A Doll's House (1879) and in The Wild Duck. No effort is made to charm an audience by a set of exciting incidents; rather are we invited into a quiet room and asked to watch the characters there, watch the expression of their sorrows and joys, and through those sorrows and joys reach to some understanding of their inner selves. The word 'soul' is an awkward one, and the word 'subconscious self' still more awkward; but, using those words with care, we may say that Ibsen strives to show to us, through this expression of ordinary joys and sorrows, ordinary love and hate, ordinary exaltation and despair, the souls or subconscious selves of his dramatis personæ. He brings the theatre into line with the added subtlety and delicacy of the time.

In dealing with Ibsen's influence in England it must, of course, be confessed that that influence was in the early period (up to 1890) by no means far-reaching. Already it has been indicated that, on his first introduction to this country, his works were greeted with a chorus of detestation. For most he was a dramatist who, apart from the non-construction of his alleged plays, deliberately selects his subjects from the most sordid, abject, even the most revolting corners of human life, relieving the crushing effect of their hideous monotony only by a mechanical, joyless mirth like the crackling of thorns.

Still, there were those who, like William Archer and Sir Edmund Gosse, defended his work in critical prose and others who endeavoured to bring his plays to the notice of a theatrical public. These tentative efforts gradually produced their effect, and, even although Mr J. T. Grein's Independent Theatre performances earned mighty abuse between 1891 and 1897, they showed themselves not merely the following of earlier experiments; it was through the Independent Theatre Society that Mr G. B. Shaw made his first bow before a London audience.

CONTINENTAL DRAMATISTS

Ibsen, of course, does not stand forward as the only Continental dramatist who taught these things to English writers, but he is the chief and most important figure. Others besides him took up the tale. In Germany Frederick Hebbel had been similarly striving to express something of his hard conception of life and his heavily hammered-out diagnosis of men's souls, now by means of Biblical dramas such as Judith (1841) and Herodes und Mariamne (1850), now by means of legendary themes such as Gyges und sein Ring (1856) and Die Nibelungen (1862), now by means of domestic tragedy such as Maria Magdalena (1844). Gyges und sein Ring is a fine example of symbolic art, in which the honest Gyges is permitted because of his magic ring to see the beautiful wife of Kandaules. The conflicting passions of Gyges, the strangely heroic yet weak figure of Kandaules, the proud and vengeful Rhodope, are all presented before us magnificently in a series of symbolic scenes whereby the inner emotions are suggested rather than enunciated. In Maria Magdalena we have, too, a powerful domestic tragedy. Clara, the heroine, is about to have a child by Leonard, who casts her off on hearing that her brother Karl is arrested as a thief. This arrest kills the mother, and the father, stern in his pride, threatens to kill himself if Clara brings shame on him. A Secretary, who is in love with Clara, kills and is killed by Leonard, and Clara drowns herself. The story is a sordid one, but is raised above the lower levels of sordid bourgeois drama by the penetrating insight into character and by the sense of fate which is introduced into several of the scenes. Clara's cry, "O God in heaven, I would have pity if I were thou and thou wert I," and the old father's last words, "I don't understand the world any more," seem wrapped in a mystic significance when they are related to the development of the play.

The kindlier and more humane Norwegian Bjørnstjerne

Björnson too now added his weight to the growth of the domestic drama and the new technique. Like Ibsen, he started with a series of historical plays, including King Sverre (1861), Sigurd the Bad (1862), and Mary Stuart in Scotland (1864), but passed from that to serious domestic comedy in The Newly Married Couple (1865), Leonarda (1879), and A Gauntlet (1883). Björnson's work is interesting as showing the development in one writer of the new technique. He starts with the older conventions, including soliloquy and aside, and passes into the freer domain already occupied by Ibsen. All his social dramas present a problem. The Newly Married Couple strives to delineate the soul of a young man, Axel, eager to make his own way in the world, and the gradual awakening of love in the heart of his wife Laura. It is certainly true that Axel is always preaching on one set subject, and so becomes rather the exponent of a particular view of life than a natural character, but the dangerous estrangement of wife and husband, as well as the difficult portrait of Mathilde, is ably handled. In Leonarda the problem is that of the mother who falls in love with her daughter's fiancé, but once more the inner beings of the dramatis personæ raise the drama above the levels of the mere problem play. Björnson's triumph is A Gauntlet. The theme is more serious than that of the others, but ends on a fairly hopeful note. Had Ibsen dealt with the theme he would almost certainly have made it a tragedy. In this play the author is fighting against the blindness and hypocrisy which characterized his own land no less than Victorian England. Svava is a child of the new age; Alfred and the Christensens are denizens of the land of unimaginative and unintelligent hypocrisy. Nowhere has Björnson so succeeded in revealing character, so succeeded in presenting a problem in all its various and widely ramifying aspects.

The new style, too, found many exponents in France. Already in the fifties and the sixties of the century, as has been seen, Dumas, Augier, and Halévy had been experimenting in new forms of the domestic drama, and the movement inaugurated by them gained a fresh impetus when Ibsen's influence began to be felt in Paris. The Théâtre Libre was established several years before our Independent Theatre, and was producing important new plays by the opening of the century's last decade. Henry Becque's Les Corbeaux (1882) is a powerful study in domestic gloom, and this was merely one of a series of naturalistic studies all informed by the modern spirit. Out of the work of the Théâtre Libre grew the plays of men such as Francois de Curel, Eugène Brieux, and Georges Ancey.

Nor did this movement stop with the passing of Ibsen. In Sweden August Strindberg had grasped all there was of strength in the new forms and had carried that along new lines. His most important plays—There are Crimes and Crimes (1899), The Dance of Death (1901)—come after 1890, although The Father (1887) and Miss Julie (1888) had been produced before that date. In other lands too the new style penetrated, coming back here by way of translation. Anton Tchekhov in Russia gave to it added subtlety in The Seagull (1896) and in Uncle Vanya (1897). Tchekhov is more visionary than Ibsen, and prefers to deal rather with mental than emotional problems. Ibsen is obsessed, no less than Björnson, with the tremendous difficulties which the fact of sex brings to life; Tchekhov deals with mental disappointments, with literary ambitions, and with artistic failures. He excels most when he is treating of the littérateur or of the poet, and his highest flights are studies of the unsuccessful. In Uncle Vanya his most telling character is Uncle Vanya himself, one whose ideas and emotions have been dulled and atrophied, and who, on the promise of success in love, is dashed back again to mediocrity. Trigorin in The Seagull is a powerful portrait of the unsuccessful visionary, a portrait made all the more striking by the contrast it presents to the boring but worldly successful doctor. A similar study of the failure in life appears in The Swan Song (1889), this time, however, in age and regret, not in disappointed youth. The old man, tragedian at heart, and murdered by the plaudits of the crowd over his clownish play, is a powerful variation on his chosen theme.

In Russia the same tendency led toward the sombre plays of Count Tolstoi—The Power of Darkness (1886) and The Live Corpse (1912)—and Maxim Gorky's studies of the underworld in The Lower Depths (1902). Everywhere, however, similar developments have manifested themselves, and with the growth of new dramatists in diverse lands the task of tracing influences becomes increasingly difficult. It is not, however, hard to see in Ibsen the master-force which, if it did not create, released the powers which went to shape the modern theatre.

While this realistic movement passed from strength to strength, it was but natural that there should be some kind of reaction. This reaction was due partly to an artistic dissatisfaction with the naturalistic method, partly it was due to the tendency which is revealed most clearly in 'impressionism,' the desire to escape from the sordid which is the real. It may be well to consider the various manifestations of an impressionistic kind later ; here be it sufficient to note that in England the forms assumed by the plays of M. Maurice Maeterlinck and of Herr Gerhard Hauptmann were supplanted by a revival merely of romantic sentiment. Abroad Maeterlinck might attempt a new medium of expression in La princesse Maleine (1889), Les aveugles (1890), and Pelléas et Mélisande (1892), and Hauptmann might experiment with Die versunkene Glocke (1896), as well as with his naturalistic Vor Sonnenaufgang (1889) and Die Weber (1892) ; in England the desires which inspired these writers led only to the Lyceum revivals of Shakespeare and the Tennysonian tragedies.

CHAPTER II

T. W. ROBERTSON AND THE DOMESTIC DRAMA

THE influence of Ibsen is all-important in the dramatic revival of the last years of the nineteenth century, but it must not be forgotten that already before 1860 various manifestations of theatrical art had indicated that the English drama was moving in the direction afterward so brilliantly indicated by him, and that considerably before he was first introduced to audiences in this country the new movement had made its definite appearance. Already in 1865 there were distinct signs of an awakening when T. W. Robertson produced his first important comedy, Society; London had to wait eight years after that before Sir Edmund Gosse first heralded Ibsen's genius in The Fortnightly Review, and had to wait even longer for the earliest translations of that dramatist.

Any account that traces the course of modern drama must include Robertson's name, and even although he kept himself to the sphere of comedy he must head the list of those who strove to introduce serious thought and actual living types into the theatre. As Mowbray Morris noted in 1882, Robertson's endeavour to make us bring "our fireside concerns to the theatre with us" must lead toward a stressing of the serious rather than of the comic. To-day Robertson is regarded as out of date, and certainly when we read or witness Society (1865), or Ours (1866), or Caste (1867), or any of the other half-dozen of Robertson's laconically titled comedies we must feel that we have long passed the stage of gentle satire and of delicate emotionalism which breathes in every one of them. There are in Robertson's plays still some of the old trammels of romantic melodrama. The highborn George D'Alroy is by way of being a sentimental hero, and his marriage with Esther Eccles is wrapped in a veil of somewhat unreal sentimentalism. For all that,

Robertson cut adrift from the prevailing atmosphere of his age. He deliberately returned to real life, depicting in his dramas the aristocratic foibles, the follies and vulgarities of the nouveaux riches, the vulgarities, different in type but none the less blatant, of the proletariat, and the careless absurdities of those he knew so well, the Bohemians of London. All of these are depicted in the spirit of satire. The loudness of the profiteer, Mr Chodd, in Society is no more attacked than the meanness and soullessness of Lady Ptarmigan; the brutality of Eccles in Caste is not more bitterly exposed than the thoughtlessness of Captain Hawtree and the thoroughly obnoxious pretensions of the Marquise. Robertson has no particular axe to grind in these plays, for he is no revolutionary. His creed is essentially Victorian; he never tires of informing us that East is East and West is West, that classes never should mingle, that the working man should learn to stay in his appointed place and the bourgeoisie have no yearnings to intrude into the often impoverished drawing-rooms and libraries of Aristocrat Castle. In this way Robertson's teaching must have been entirely in accord with the sentiments of the larger moiety of his audience; but his satire is none the less present, and he faces, if in no very profound manner, the social problems of his day. It is not what Robertson did that makes him a forerunner of modern drama, but his tentative methods of looking at life. Earlier Victorians were content to leave life out of the theatre, or at best to display there only the thrilling events of a disastrous or criminal kind. The rumbling growl of proletarian anger they were pleased to forget in witnessing the romantic adventures of a distressed heroine and a noble hero in some medieval surroundings. Robertson showed men that ordinary life could be brought into the theatre for the good both of drama and of spectators; that the problems of social existence were clamouring for expression in literary form. In style, too, Robertson struck a new note. A performance of Caste at the present day may seem at times somewhat stilted. There are occasional lapses into an artificiality of dialogue which savours of eighteenth-century senti-mentalism, but for the most part the language is free and natural. Our feelings of dissatisfaction arise only from the fact that we have improved still further on Robertson's style. We have ransacked the provincial dialects of England and Ireland, we have studied subtly the possibilities of Cockney speech and the speech of lower middle-class suburbia, for the purposes of the theatre; and we have evolved a form of dramatic dialogue which is absolutely natural. It was Robertson who pointed the way toward the consummation; the naturalism of his stage conversations comes as a welcome relief after the impossible vaporizings of impossible characters in the romantic melodrama and lifeless comedy of preceding years.

Robertson himself did not carry his work very far; sentimentalism ever stayed his hand; and the majority of his immediate successors and of his contemporaries refused to move very far from the even path he had trodden out for himself. Most of the dramatists of the time were men like H. J. Byron, anxious only to secure an immediate stage success, daring never to leave the beaten track. In Cyril's Success (1868) Byron tried to write a problem drama, but his treatment is absurdly sentimental. His story of Cyril Cuthbert, led astray by literary success and eventually reconciled to his wife, is conceived in hopelessly artificial terms. Only a slight advance is marked in his later Married in Haste (1876), where the difficulties that arise from too hasty marriage and from the artistic jealousy of husband and wife are taken as the main theme of the play. Joseph Knight's criticism of his drama is just and aptly hits off the impression made by scores of similar works: "When first heard . . . it leaves the impression of being a clever and almost a good play. Reflection is required before we perceive that the story is artificial and improbable as well as flimsy"—only nowadays the reflective impression comes more rapidly than it did in Knight's time.

Sentimentalism ruled everywhere. James Albery's once-famed Two Roses (1870) is sickeningly sweet. Sydney Grundy, who to the last protested against the frankness of the newer school, persisted long in turning out plays of an impossible virtue. A Pair of Spectacles (1890), taken from Les petits oiseaux of Labiche and Delacour, is a rather foolish commentary on social life; A Fool's Paradise (1892) might have been made into a genuine domestic tragedy, but to Grundy the weak the tragic spirit was denied; Sowing the Wind (1893) deals with the problem of the illegitimate child, but so delicately and in such refined strain that it could produce no possible effect. Grundy's softness and prettiness are exemplified fully in A Bunch of Violets (1894), the very title of this play being symbolic of his achievement. Beautiful maidens smiling through distress and discovering in final acts that they are really heiresses—the spirit of Home Chat and Peg's Paper—these are what appealed to Grundy.

Grundy has been dealt with here because his dramatic work indicates for how long this sentimental style endured. Already, however, the new movement was well under weigh. Two young men in particular had already started their careers, and although neither could claim to have produced anything by 1890 of outstanding importance, each showed that he had in him the qualities which make for eminence. The first was an actor named Arthur Wing Pinero, who at the age of twenty-two first appeared as a dramatist with a light piece, £200 a Year (1877). For a time he occupied himself with farces and trivial comedies, but even in The Squire (1881) William Archer, ably discerning, had found evidence of the existence of a "thoughtful and conscientious writer with artistic aims." In Sweet Lavender (1888) it might have appeared that he was bent only on following in Grundy's footsteps; to one critic at least it seemed that he had given "an admirable retort witty to the disciples of Zola and naturalisme who think a play cannot be healthy without being insipid." Immediately before this, however, Sir Arthur (then Mr) Pinero had shown a power and a skill in light comedy (The Magistrate, 1885, The Schoolmistress, 1886, and Dandy Dick, 1887) which indicated an independent and talented mind, so that one need not be surprised to find Sweet Lavender followed by The Weaker Sex (1888). The Weaker Sex deals with the problem of one returned from the past. The main story tells how Philip Lyster, having quarrelled with Lady Vivash, had left her to go to America. There he has made a name for himself as Ira Lee. Returning, he falls in love with Lady Vivash's daughter, Sylvia. In the end, realizing the hopelessness of the position, he departs from both their lives. There is certainly nothing very startling here, and the satire directed at women who profess the way political seems hopelessly inept and stupid; but the tone is firmer than in any of Sir Arthur Pinero's earlier works. This was followed by The Profligate (1889), in which a darker theme is chosen, and that in turn paved the way for The Second Mrs Tanqueray (1893).

THE DOMESTIC DRAMA

Henry Arthur Jones made his début one year after that of Sir Arthur Pinero, with Only round the Corner, in 1878. His first efforts were sentimental and melodramatic in style, reaching a culmination in the thrilling spectacle of The Silver King (1882), a work which, although artificial in theme, contains some powerfully conceived and admirably handled situations. Two years after the production of this piece (1884), however, came Breaking a Butterfly, an adaptation of A Doll's House, and Saints and Sinners. The latter is a drama which, in spite of many essentially melodramatic features, was a more remarkable play in 1884 than The Profligate was in 1889. It takes for its sphere the English middle class in a provincial town, introducing as principal characters Hoggard, the ruthless small-business man, and Prabble, the mean little grocer of low mentality and outward godliness. Into this atmosphere comes the figure of Letty, daughter of Pastor Fletcher, and symbolic of ideals and desires above and beyond their sordid environments. In its development the drama takes a double course. On the one hand, we are presented with a set of everyday problems, the hatred of the petty shopkeeper at the larger Co-operative Stores, the meaninglessness of conventional Puritanism, the rapacity and poverty of soul in middle-class society. On the other, we are treated to a somewhat melodramatic story in which Letty is betrayed by a high-born villain, one Captain Fanshawe. Letty dies, but not before there is a scene of pathos in which her true lover, George Kingsmill, has returned to breathe his most generous of sentiments. The two moods hardly go together, but they are indicative merely of the fact that in 1884 the drama had not succeeded fully in emancipating itself from the shackles which had lain heavy upon it for nearly a century. The atmosphere of soul-poverty was continued in Judah (1890), a much more finely written play, in which Jones continued to deal with problems of man's spiritual life. Sir Arthur Pinero had so far thought only of further elaborations of the usual themes of sex ; Jones realized that the drama, if it were to advance, must get beyond that to depict, in the largest sense of the word, man's religious faiths and to trace his spiritual life.

With the work of these two men the foundation of the modern drama was laid. The last years of the eighties saw the growth of an entirely new attitude toward the drama. The productions of F. C. Philips' As in a Looking Glass (1887) and of Sydney Grundy and F. C. Philips' The Dean's Daughter (1888) during the season of 1887-88 showed the way theatrical tastes were moving. The promise of Robertson was about to be fulfilled.

CHAPTER III

GILBERT AND SULLIVAN

AT the period when the domestic drama was thus being tentatively established one man, Sir William Schwenck Gilbert, succeeded in reaching almost absolute perfection in one particular dramatic form. To define the Savoy Operas is impossible; they exist on a plane of their own, and, although they belong to the extravaganza tradition and although they have exerted a considerable influence on later English comedy, it is impossible to class them justly either with the one or the other. Gilbert's dramatic career had started in the seventies, when, in the variety of different styles he attempted, he indicated the many qualities which later went to make up the spirit of the Savoy Operas. His main tendencies were cynical, witty, and satirical, with a decided leaning toward parody and burlesque; but to these he added a strangely poetic fancy and a delicate, whimsical humour. Gilbert can see the opposite side of the picture as the romantic poets could not see it, yet he retains something of their fervour; he can be as intellectually witty as any man, yet there always exists in his work that sense of topsy-turvyism which reminds us of the atmosphere of Shakespeare's comedy of humour.

Something of these qualities is apparent already in The Palace of Truth (1870) in which King Phanor's enchanted palace, where all entering must speak the truth, forms the setting. There the cold Princess Zeolide becomes hysterically passionate; the gushing Prince Philamir there grows blasé and chill; there the sardonically bitter Aristæus becomes a genial philosopher. Gilbert's fancy is well exemplified in the scenes where the coquettish Azema tries to entrap first Philamir and then Chrystal, truthfully revealing as she does so all the artifices of the coquette's trade. The same mood dominates in the rather delightful Pygmalion and Galatea (1871), where the classic legend is seriously dealt with. The pure element of poetry in Gilbert's work finds no finer expression than is given here, although the use of the pathetic is delicately and imaginatively utilized again in Broken Hearts (1875), another fairy comedy. The whimsicality, on the other hand, is exploited in the farcical comedy of Tom Cobb (1875), where the mock reverence of women is cleverly dealt with. The truth is that Gilbert was a genius unique in kind. In his laughter lurks an element of bitterness; in his parody a note of reverence; in his irresponsible topsy-turvyism a serious purpose. Those who flock to The Mikado (1885) or to The Pirates of Penzance (1879) or to Patience (1881) may for the most part lose sight of the bitterness and the seriousness of aim, but, although his first object was to raise a laugh or to charm by a song, he desired that the laugh and the song should bear the sting of a satirical touch. Even such a delightfully fantastic opera as Patience exhibits this. The cult of the sunflower and the velvet breeches has now long passed away, but it was quite a fashionable thing in the last decades of the nineteenth century. Gilbert's satire of it reminds us of the satire of Restoration times, even as his wit sometimes has a flavour of Congreve's style. This revival of Restoration atmosphere was to be of great import for the development of later comedy, and even although we recognize that his precise medium is inimitable, we must realize that he had a considerable influence upon his contemporaries. He killed the full flower, now too full blown, of the romantic poetic play, substituting in its stead this satiric style of his own. Though there was none to carry on his work directly, he aided in dethroning an artificial imagination in favour of a fanciful realism.

The genuine creativeness of Gilbert's style is revealed when we turn from it to the pretentiousness of the contemporary Tennysonian poetic play. Where Gilbert invented and threw personality into his work, Tennyson merely carried on the dull old strains of romantic verse drama. Tennyson tries his best at poetic drama, but fails to infuse into the form anything of freshness or beautiful novelty. In spite of the "infinite trouble" which he bestowed on his tragedies Queen Mary (printed 1875 ; acted 1876), Harold (1877), and Becket (printed 1884 ; acted 1891) do not live. Didactic purpose, this time taking the form not of revolutionary altruism, but of patriotic orthodoxy, kills in them the true spirit of drama. The characters seem automata created only to become the mouthpieces of the poet, and the action drags or is chaotically confused by the lack of central purpose in the plot. His plays had a certain theatrical success, it is true, but it was a success which depended rather on the magnetic personality of an Irving than on the dramatic skill of a Tennyson. Tennyson continually looked back ; Gilbert, inspired though he may have been by Planché, looked to the future.

PART VII

THE REVIVAL IN THE THEATRE (1890-1920)

CHAPTER I

MAIN TENDENCIES

THE drama that we know as 'modern' was definitely founded in the nineties of the last century, although, as we have seen, the efforts of various playwrights of the 1860-90 period did much to clear the path for their successors. It was only after 1890 that Ibsen's influence came to be deeply felt, and, although years had still to pass before his treatment of themes and his technical methods came to be fully accepted, it is evident that from 1890 onward a new spirit and a new enthusiasm have the dramatists in their grip.

The development, of course, was not always a direct one, and Ibsen emasculated had for a time to serve ere audiences became sufficiently bold to throw over Clement Scott and accept William Archer as their teacher. Ibsen had drawn the woman of the future; Pinero substituted the woman with a past, and, being well aware of what the public wanted, was heartily acclaimed. For a time the stage revelled in the company of ladies who, outwardly respectable, were known to have some dark secrets in their lives, and, although their company was perhaps a trifle more interesting than that of earlier sentimental heroines, they stood far off from the array of Ibsen's women. The public soon got cured of their interest in this kind of person and passed to newer objects of affection, each step bringing them just a little nearer to the profound view of life expounded dramatically by the Norwegian master. In spite, however, of the clearly marked stages of progress, certain definite main tendencies may be traced—tendencies which affected almost all the dramatists of this time, even though each found a different way of enunciating them.

356

The first of these tendencies is a heritage from Ibsen and from the domestic melodrama. For the most part, serious drama from 1890 onward ceased to deal with themes remote in time or place. Ibsen had taught men that drama, if it was to live a true life of its own, must deal with human emotions, with things near and dear to ordinary men and women. Hence the melodramatic romanticism and the chill pseudo-classic remoteness alike disappeared in favour of a treatment of actual English life, first of aristocratic existence, then of middle-class lives, and finally of labouring conditions. So far as choice of subject-matter is concerned, the break between the Ion and Virginius of the early romantic period and the Nan and Waste of later days is complete. But difference in subject-matter is not all. With the treatment of actual life the drama became more and more a drama of ideas, sometimes veiled in the main action, sometimes didactically set forth. These ideas were for the most part revolutionary, so that the drama came to form an advanced battleground for a rising school of young thinkers. Revolt took the form of reaction to past literary models, to current social conventions, and to the prevailing morality of Victorian England. We thus find that sex and the problems of sex occupy by far the greatest place in the new drama, sharing their position only with the problems of labour and the problems of youth. For the new dramatists parental authority represented Victorianism and outworn ideals; romantic love represented the sentimentalism which they were fighting against; capitalism represented the social state which they were bent on altering. The spirit of youth, liberated, eager to strike out on new paths, breathes in many of these plays. Young men struggle to throw off the trammels of Victorian prejudice; young women join eagerly the Feminist movement and glory in a new-found liberty. Constantly questing, constantly restless and dissatisfied, seem the characters of these plays, especially when they are placed by the side of their predecessors, the placid heroes and clinging heroines of romantic drama. Romantic love, too, came in for its particular onslaughts. New investigations into the meaning of sex, which gave to the nineteenth century the philosophy of Schopenhauer and to the twentieth that of Freud, brought men to believe no more in love as it was expressed by their forefathers, but in what Mr Bernard Shaw has styled the life force. With the sundering of those veils of prudery with which the Victorian era had clothed the facts of sex, the new dramatists came to take a definitely scientific view of life. Social convention, common standards of existence, seemed as nothing compared with this tremendous fact; Ann tracks down the father of her children in Man and Superman, and her sister, Ann Leete, in Mr Granville-Barker's play, throws over Lord John Carp for the plebeian John Abud. Mightily the dramatists loved to make Life and Nature play their great parts on the stage. The desire for liberty in domestic and in moral circles was paralleled by the desire for liberty in social life. Suddenly the playwrights became aware of the depressing circumstances in which the poor are fated to dwell; they viewed the squalor and the misery of the cities; they looked around and saw the terror of modern civilization. The class-war, which has found its expression in actual life, was freely dealt with by the newer school, cynically yet profoundly by men such as Mr Bernard Shaw, seriously by men such as Mr Galsworthy.

Being a drama of ideas, the modern theatre tended to become more static. The necessity of expressing in the three hours' traffic of the stage a multitude of diverse theories and points of view seriously interfered with the action of many plays. Inner conflict was substituted for outer conflict, and drama became quieter than had been the swashbuckling romantic theatre of previous years. This development, as has been hinted above, was a normal one, and but betokens the gradual progress by which the drama kept abreast of changing conditions. This inner quality of the modern theatre was intensified greatly by the recent investigations of psychologists. The new study of the 'soul' interested many, and none more than the dramatists. In their plays, therefore, they sought ever more subtly and delicately to limn the most intricate aspects of the human spirit.

MAIN TENDENCIES

In many ways this inwardness is connected with another marked development in twentieth-century dramatic art. To express these almost inexpressible ideas, emotions, instincts, which the psychologists have defined for us, the new writers found that ordinary direct words were insufficient. They found, that is to say, precisely the same difficulty which faced the mystics of countless centuries before, and they came to employ the same methods for the explaining of their purposes. Where direct enunciation was impossible or unsatisfactory they had recourse to symbolism. This symbolism in itself aided in raising the dark and even sordid themes chosen by the dramatists to artistic levels they otherwise could not have reached. The white horses in Rosmersholm, the wild duck in the play of that name, the roaring waters of the Severn tide in Mr Masefield's Nan, the waves dashing in ceaseless fury through Synge's Riders to the Sea, the bleak expanses of industrial landscape in Miss Sowerby's Rutherford and Son, all give unity and universality to the various tragedies in which they appear. Perhaps the dramatists are not fully conscious of the end at which they would aim in introducing these things; but consciously or unconsciously they are employing one of the surest means of raising apparently sordid subject-matter on to a higher and truly tragic plane.

With the increased inwardness must be accounted, too, a tendency on the part of some of our living dramatists to make their protagonists not men, but unseen forces. Reference here is not to ghost-forms such as Sir James Barrie's Mary Rose, but to the employment of social forces for the purpose of making wider and larger the sphere of drama. More will be said of this in a treatment of Mr Galsworthy's work, but the tendency must be noted here as one of the chief which separates the earlier theatre from the later.

Turning from the drame and tragedy proper to the world of comedy, we find many marked developments in these years. Perhaps that which deserves most attention is the revival of the comedy of manners. In many ways we seem now to be approaching a new Augustan period, when reason rather than imagination, common sense rather than romantic nonsense, will dominate life and literature. It cannot be denied that a definite return is being made to the witty, satirical comedy which rose to full flourish with Congreve in 1700. Oscar Wilde, Henry Arthur Jones, and a number of others aided in the establishment of this form of drama once more; the successful revivals of The Beggar's Opera and The Way of the World seem to mark a certain correspondence in the tastes of the public. At times this new comedy of manners is almost purely fanciful and dependent upon wit for its being, but more frequently it assumes a cynical and bitter tone which corresponds in its own way to the social purpose of more serious playwrights. Mr Maugham's Our Betters, for example, while reflecting the style of the manners comedy, has in its apparently cynical satire a depth and seriousness lacking in most works of the seventeenth century. Of these The Plain-Dealer, perhaps, is nearest it in general aim and atmosphere. It is perfectly natural that the age should be satiric. Satire will always flourish in a society which has become over-civilized, where the artificial life rendered necessary by city existence has driven men emotionally and morally to depart over-far from elemental conditions and primitive impulses. It is probable that this satire will continue as a marked feature of modern dramatic activity.

No account of modern drama can be complete without a reference to the Shavian comedy. Mr Bernard Shaw is a peculiar admixture of Ibsen and Wycherley. His aim is as serious, his analysis is as deep, as those of any of the more solemn dramatists, yet he cloaks that seriousness of purpose with a gaiety and a wit which has rarely been equalled in any time. We may call Mr Shaw's plays comedies of purpose. They aim at being as laughable as Congreve's, as stinging as Jonson's, as profound as Ibsen's. There is no earlier comedy in English akin to those of Mr Shaw; he has brought to the English stage a type of drama entirely new—a type, however, which few could follow.

MAIN TENDENCIES

Unquestionably critics of a hundred years hence will regard his plays as one of the most notable contributions to the theatre in our time, but it is probable that they will find only one or two with whom to compare him. The comedy of purpose, if it is not to drift into mere sentimentalism, demands a genius not only of a high, but of a peculiar order.

A brief summary of the main tendencies noted may close this section. Drama, we have seen, became after 1890 a drama of ideas, but of ideas based always on the contemporary social conditions. The themes of tragedy were normally taken from actual life, and in the majority a problem of social or moral import was presented before the spectator. With this there is to be observed the rise of symbolic elements in the theatre, leading in their extreme form to the tragedies of Mr W. B. Yeats. In comedy a revival of the manners style and a plentiful employment of satire mark the best works of the present century, and Mr Bernard Shaw has introduced what is virtually a new type of drama in his long series of realistically fanciful plays.

CHAPTER II

DOMESTIC TRAGEDY AND PROBLEM PLAY

SIR A. W. PINERO AND HENRY ARTHUR JONES

SIR ARTHUR WING PINERO deservedly holds one of the chief positions in the world of what we may style pre-modern drama. His place has been taken by other playwrights more revolutionary than he, but his influence on the dramatists of the eighteen-nineties was enormous, and is still exercised on more than one present-day writer. Sir Arthur Pinero's work is, as has already been indicated, of a very varied quality and style. His theatrical efforts are numerous, extending from his first farce of 1877 to the recently produced A Cold June of 1932. Probably, however, he will be remembered most for four problem plays—The Second Mrs Tanqueray (1893), The Notorious Mrs Ebbsmith (1895), Iris (1901), and Mid-Channel (1909). With these, for historical purposes, may be considered The Times (1891).

All of these are alike in dealing with problems of social life in a manner tragic or approaching to the tragic. In style they are marked by the same features which distinguish all the Pinero plays—excellence of construction. It is a fact, however, that in the world of the drama construction may be too excellent. It may rise to such a pitch of perfection that it becomes positively mechanical. French writers such as Sardou, Scribe, and Augier had taught to playwrights the secret of this construction. Dramas were rolled off ceaselessly to a set plan. Characters, incidents, exposition, climax, and dénouement—all were governed by certain laws, and once the mould was secured plaster casts could be struck off almost indefinitely. Sir Arthur Pinero, starting his work at the age of twenty-two in 1877, had learned much from this school, and the construction of all his later plays shows its baneful effect. His characters are often 'theatrical' rather than real; his situations have an unnatural atmosphere; the development of his plots bears witness to a somewhat mechanical rigidity. The fetters of the mid-nineteenth century still hinder his free progress to a more dominant art-form. It is typical of this mechanical structure that The Profligate (1889) was provided with a double ending, by which the curtain fell either on unmitigated tragedy or on a conventional happy ending where the hero is forgiven and all is well. The vicious taste of late seventeenth-century drama, which influenced Suckling's Aglaure and Howard's The Vestal Virgin, was not lost even in 1889.

DOMESTIC TRAGEDY & PROBLEM PLAY

These weaknesses arising out of an excellence of construction which becomes dully mechanical are paralleled by another notable trait in Sir Arthur Pinero's more serious work. He deals with the stuff of tragedy, but rarely in a tragic manner. To understand this aright we must return for a moment to the question of the drame. The drame, that form of playwriting which was invented in the eighteenth century, provides a novel and perfectly legitimate sphere for the dramatist. The drame is simply a serious problem play where the emotions never rise to tragic height and where the dénouement is in harmony with the general atmosphere of the plot. Drame and tragedy can rarely, if ever, be mingled. They are distinct in their separate realms, and a confusion of the two can lead only to disaster. The emotions of tragedy are those primarily of terror and awe, allied to a feeling of pre-eminent majesty. If these be lacking the resultant play will fall into that unhappy ground inhabited by so many of the tragic dramatists of the Augustan period. It cannot be too often insisted that pity and pathos are not genuinely tragic emotions. Both may appear in great tragedies, but then only as a relief to larger and more soul-consuming passions. It is rare that in Sir Arthur Pinero's dramas we meet with those passions. His plays exist mainly on a problem, implied or stated, and on the emotion of pity.

The approach toward his most characteristic kind of achievement had appeared already in The Weaker Sex (1888), and in The Times (1891). The former, it is true, is coloured highly by sentimentalism, and the latter aims rather at 'comic' than at 'tragic' appeal. In The Times we are introduced to a certain self-made tradesman, Percy Egerton-Bompas by name, whose one object in life is to obtain an entry into society. Naturally he is delighted when he learns that his daughter Beryl has become engaged to Lord Lurgashall, but disaster comes when it is discovered that his weak and stupid son Howard has secretly married his landlady's daughter. An attempt is made to hush up the scandal by 'educating' the wife and her mother, but the secret is soon revealed, and at the close of the drama we see Bompas a broken man. The theme is one which might have provided good dramatic material, but sentimentalism is permitted over-freely to intrude when Lurgashall reaffirms his desire of marrying Beryl. There seems a confusion here between a sentimentally conceived problem play and a satiric comedy; in The Second Mrs Tanqueray Sir Arthur Pinero was to mix, in a somewhat similar manner, the moods of tragedy and of the problem drama. This famous play deals with a problem of life, the problem of a man (Aubrey Tanqueray) who marries a woman (Paula) whom he loves, but whose past he knows to be deeply stained. The plot is well worked out, with the aid of subsidiary characters such as Ellean, the daughter, and Cayley Drummle, the good-hearted friend, ending with the suicide of the unhappy Paula. Rising to a height of emotional tension in that famous "I'm sorry, Aubrey," it yet fails to stir those deeper passions which the highest tragic art brings to us. The author succeeds in bringing tears to every eye, but the greatest tragedy soars to a lofty expanse where tears are useless and only dry-eyed fear and awe can dwell. The Second Mrs Tanqueray is a well-written play, but it is not a great tragedy. Nor can we style it a drame. It fails in the final test, striving at tragic emotion and succeeding only in the calling forth of pathos.

BRITISH DRAMA

The pathetic and the spuriously theatric combine similarly to mar The Notorious Mrs Ebbsmith, a study in character spoilt by such 'curtains' as that at the close when the free-thinking heroine, after flinging a Bible into the fire, " utters a loud cry . . . , and, thrusting her arm into the fire, drags out the book." In Sir Arthur Pinero's work as a whole we note a sort of trusting simplicity and conventional theorizing going hand in hand ; his treatment of Lady Vivash and her companions in The Weaker Sex gave evidence of this, and another example, of even greater significance, is presented here. Similar weakness is to be found in Iris and even in Mid-Channel, although in the latter play the characters are treated with a greater firmness and sureness of touch. Nor has it disappeared in Sir Arthur's last-published play, The Enchanted Cottage (1922). The theme of this drama—the coming of beauty through love—is worked out in a distinctly unsatisfactory manner. The dream-world (of Barrie-esque flavour) is lacking in conviction of aim ; the theme is handled with a decided lack of strength. Perhaps the particular weakness here may most effectively be realized when The Enchanted Cottage is compared with Mr Charles McEvoy's The Likes of Her, in which a similar situation is dealt with on more realistic lines.

DOMESTIC TRAGEDY & PROBLEM PLAY

Whatever failings Sir Arthur Pinero has, however, he must be acclaimed as a master of his craft and as one of the most important figures in the dramatic revival of our times. His sentimentalism and sometimes conventional treatment of character do not take from his importance as a pioneer who brought back the drama to more natural realms. Very materially did he contribute toward the intimate treatment of life's problems in the theatre and toward the introduction of a dialogue vivid and realistic. The Second Mrs Tanqueray was an epoch-making play ; Mid-Channel, Iris, Letty (1903), The Thunderbolt (1908), and even The 'Mind-the-Paint' Girl (1912) prove that Sir Arthur was more than a pioneer, that for long he kept abreast of the movement which he himself had been so largely instrumental in inaugurating.

It is inevitable that the works of Sir Arthur Pinero should be considered alongside those of H. A. Jones ; both started their dramatic careers about the same time, both came to turn their energies toward a revitalization of the theatre. Already the early Saints and Sinners and Judah have been considered in this connexion. These studies in what might be termed provincial religion were immediately followed by others of a similar tendency. The poetic The Tempter (1893), itself unsatisfactory, might be regarded as a stepping-stone from the first experiments in this kind to The Triumph of the Philistines (1895) and Michael and his Lost Angel (1896). The first treats this subject in a mood of bitter and sardonic humour, the latter in a mood approaching the tragic. No doubt Jones was right in regarding Michael and his Lost Angel as his most finely written play, yet here he too, like Sir Arthur Pinero, is apt to fall into the pitfall of sentimentalism. Audrie Lesden is one of the most memorable figures in the sphere of domestic drama, but the certainty shown in her portraiture is spoilt, as Mr Bernard Shaw divined, by an inconsistency in the depicting of Michael. Instead of retaining the true stuff of tragic drama, we approach again the sphere held by so many playwrights of the eighteen-nineties.

BRITISH DRAMA

Jones' plays were not confined to this one style. Between The Tempter and The Triumph of the Philistines appeared The Masqueraders (1894), which deals with the all-consuming and altruistic love of David Remon for the thoughtless Dulcie Larondie. This theme of almost heroic passion is one which made a peculiar appeal to Jones ; another version of it appeared in The Physician (1897), wherein is shown the almighty passion of Dr Carey for Edana Hinde. Among the later plays unquestionably the finest is Mrs Dane's Defence (1900), which calls for special mention, not so much because of its subject as because of its supreme technical skill. The scene in which Sir Daniel Carteret divines the secret of Mrs Dane's past, with its artistically sustained tension and vivid dramatic interest, displays Jones' mastery and keen sense of the theatre more effectively than any other in the entire range of his many dramas. As a whole, however, the drama is unsatisfactory ; it indicates that the author, pioneer though he was, could not keep abreast of the rapidly moving social consciousness of his time. He has striven to imitate Ibsen, but in doing so he has chosen a problem which might be thought hardly to exist. Mrs

366

DOMESTIC TRAGEDY & PROBLEM PLAY

Dane's past contained nothing that is strikingly terrible, and there seems no necessity for her sentimental return to her son in the last act and for the pretty-pretty touch of Janet's kiss. In atmosphere the play dates back beyond even Saints and Sinners.

Perhaps Jones' most serious failing was his seriousness. He was always very much in earnest, as his many critical pronouncements indicated, but his mind, perhaps because of that seriousness, refused to move rapidly enough to keep in touch with his age. He was a magnificent craftsman; he did much to set the new drama on its triumphant career; but after 1896 he seemed to lose touch with his times and to become merely a relic of the past. Sir Arthur Pinero's strength is seen when we compare his plays of the decade 1900-10, expressive of changed conditions, with Jones' later efforts.

(ii) JOHN GALSWORTHY

In dealing with the work of those major dramatists who, following the path indicated by Sir Arthur Pinero and H. A. Jones, essayed the serious problem drama and the bourgeois tragedy, we must for convenience make some distinctions in regard to the forms chosen and to the atmosphere aimed at. Thus one of the most important figures in the early days of the dramatic renaissance was Mr George Bernard Shaw, yet, as Mr Shaw's plays follow a bent of their own, they have to be considered not here, but in a later section. At the same time it is to be observed that his trenchant genius impressed itself deeply upon his age, so that many dramatists whose works otherwise fall into a category quite apart from his own show themselves influenced by his dominant ideas and by his treatment of social questions. Similarly, we must draw some sort of line between the typical work done for the London theatres and the typical work produced at the Abbey Theatre, Dublin. Men like Mr St John Ervine help to bridge the gulf, but there is something in the Irish plays wholly lacking in the English, something which expresses itself in a richly imaginative treatment of the most sordid themes and a tendency toward what can be called only by the name of mysticism. The English playwrights first may challenge our attention here. Of these dramatists John Galsworthy, Harley Granville-Barker, and Mr John Masefield are undoubtedly the most important, the first two for their treatment of domestic and social problems, the last for his attainment of a high form of problemless domestic tragedy. John Galsworthy's dramatic career began only in 1906 with the production of The Silver Box, and the style he adumbrated in that play was brought to even greater perfection in Strife (1909), Justice (1910), The Pigeon (1912), The Eldest Son (1912), The Fugitive (1913), The Mob (1914), The Skin Game (1920), and Loyalties (1922). This list, which omits many lesser works, shows Galsworthy's keen dramatic activity, and when it is remembered that these are among the most unquestioned literary successes of the twentieth century we realize that he was a dominant force in the theatre of his day.

All of his plays exhibit the same features—the omnipresence of a fundamental social problem expressed in a severely natural manner, without straining of situations or exaggeration of final issues; a corresponding naturalism of dialogue, leading at times to an apparent ordinariness; a native kindliness of heart added to the sternness of the true tragic artist; and a complete absence of sentimentalism even when pitiful scenes are introduced. These form the most marked outward features of Galsworthy's realistic theatre, but there is one other quality which is often overlooked by his critics. The very titles of his dramas give a clue to this quality. It is not of Macbeths and Hamlets that Galsworthy writes, not even of Dr Stockmanns or of Nans; his characters are all ordinary, commonplace men and women such as we might meet with every day. Sometimes, indeed, instead of being above they seem to be below the general average of human intellect and of human power. This has led a number of critics to question the force of his tragic appeal. No great hero is presented to us in these plays, they say; therefore our highest passions are not called out as they are summoned irresistibly forth by King Lear and Othello. These critics seem mistakenly to have stumbled upon what marks out Galsworthy's tragedies as distinctive in their time. Instead of taking as his heroes the men of individualized and peculiarly great qualities, he has adopted the faiths, ideals, and forces of modern social life. In this, perhaps, he is but expressing more forcibly than others a tendency visible everywhere in the early twentieth century, and in one respect he has thus anticipated the methods on which Toller's 'expressionistic' style is based. When Mr Bernard Shaw reduced that old Victorian ideal, Napoleon Buonaparte, to a rather ordinary human being, and displayed Cleopatra as a kittenish young scapegrace, he was but doing cynically what Galsworthy would do seriously. The age of hero-worship seemed to have passed by. Individualism and the passion for individualism was a Renaissance product; in the highly civilized twentieth century the faith and the class seemed to swallow up the personalities who threw themselves into this or that movement. Men did not stand aghast at a Napoleon; their terror was aroused by forces which might seem dominated by one single figure, but which they realized were, after all, that one man's invincible master. The class-war which faced men was not the creation of capitalist or communist; it was the creation of twentieth-century social conditions. The power of the law, which at times seemed to crush down the unfortunate and the innocent as well as the guilty, was not the work of one man or even of one body of men; it had an existence and an independence all its own. The intangible terror of the mob spirit was seen to depend, not on the will of any one individual forming that mob, but upon some unseen presence which transcended and transformed all. In this world men oftentimes questioned that line of Shakespeare's which gave Sir James Barrie the title for one of his later plays:

DOMESTIC TRAGEDY & PROBLEM PLAY

The fault, dear Brutus, is not in our stars,
But in ourselves, that we are underlings, and if they did not share Kent's view that

It is the stars, the stars above us govern our conditions, they were tempted to believe that civilization had grown so huge, so vast, so majestic, that it crushed mankind miserably beneath it. It is this truth that Galsworthy would teach. The governor and the warders of the prison in Justice are not inhuman brutes ; the business men are not grasping materialists, callous and hard-hearted ; yet these men are the tools of destiny. The pitiful Falder is caught in the toils of a force which transcends all the characters in the drama ; they are not the direct cause of his fate ; his fate depends upon society. The place that the tyrant took in ancient days is assumed by an invisible yet omnipresent force of civilization.

BRITISH DRAMA

This leads us to the question of Galsworthy's tragic appeal. Judged by the standards of Grecian and Elizabethan art his plays are not high tragedies. There is in them no single hero who stands forward as a dominant figure, rising to a loftier height than his fellow-men. But we cannot judge the art of the present day by the standards of the past. That was the error of the pseudo-classical critics of the Augustan period. If we come to essentials we find that Galsworthy's plays do not fall, as Sir Arthur Pinero's fall, into pathos. The author possesses, despite his kindness of heart, a genuine tragic firmness. We do not feel pity for the fate of Falder so much as we feel awe in contemplating the mighty millstones of Justice, grinding exceeding small, ruthless and fateful in their silent power. The tragic atmosphere dominates the play ; tears are useless and vain. The heroes of Galsworthy's dramas are the unseen fates of modern existence, against which we, poor mortals, can but pitifully cry out in moments of desperation and horror.

All of these dramas depend upon a social problem of this sort. The Silver Box deals with the old adage that there is one law for the rich and another for the poor. It is not, however, that Jack Barthwick, the happily born thief, is so thoroughly a rascal, as that he finds himself in circumstances over which he has no control. During the police-court scene, when the magistrate tells Jones, the thief of no connexions and no money, that he is " a nuisance to the community," Jack Barthwick leans from his seat and cries, "Dad! that's what you said to me!" Both father and son realize perfectly that Jones is being badly treated, that he and Jack should, in a just society, have received the same punishment; but circumstances will it otherwise. The one is a rich man's son; the other is a nobody. Society, that invisible presence, determines that the rich shall be preferred to the poor. So in Strife Galsworthy does not make either Anthony, director of the company, or Roberts, leader of the workers, a man who governs events. Both, possibly, possess iron wills. They have determined to fight to the bitter end, but they are not individualities as the Shakespearian heroes were. Anthony takes his strength from what may be called the capitalist faith, Roberts takes his from the faith of the rebels. Fundamentally, each is incapable of doing otherwise than he does. This play well illustrates Galsworthy's fine treatment of that tremendous impression of waste which Professor Bradley so ably discerns in the Shakespearian drama. All the modern author's tragedies gain poignancy from this impression. Strife ends with wasted lives and a settlement the terms of which are precisely the same as those proposed at the beginning of the struggle. In Justice we feel the waste implied by Falder's suicide, and the same spirit is trenchantly expressed in The Mob. The Pigeon, The Eldest Son, The Fugitive, and Loyalties are all alike in producing this atmosphere and in making the faiths of man his masters. In The Pigeon it is a question of the vagabonds and the poor. In The Eldest Son it is the problem of morality as applied to rich and to poor. The Fugitive treats of women's position in social life. The spirit of the crowd and idealism dominate The Mob. Loyalties is a study in racial pride and social convention. In not one of these is a true hero, yet all are full of heroes. In all the tragic impression is sure, because of this sense of super-human forces and of the waste involved in their clash and conflict. In these ways Galsworthy's drama, true as it is to the finest traditions of tragic art, is fundamentally modern, expressing to his age the spirit of the twentieth century as Shakespeare's tragedies enshrined the spirit of the Renascence. Our study of drama, if it is to teach us anything, must teach us to be prepared to welcome new developments in that art which, above all others, is most sensitive to the ideals of the age in which it is born. To attempt to imitate Shakespearian drama now, in its original form, would be as absurd as to plead for a return to the stage-coach in place of the locomotive. Man wishes for means of conveyance in all ages ; the desire was the same in ancient Egypt as it is to-day, but the means are different. So in tragedy the fundamental passions remain unaltered from century to century, informing the work of Ibsen as they informed the work of Æschylus ; only the means which Æschylus used to arouse those passions bear the same relation to the means of Ibsen that a chariot does to an aeroplane. The one is the perfect expression of Grecian life, the other of modern, and, while we may still appreciate the worth of the more ancient, we realize that it will be inadequate to cope with the changed conditions of a modern consciousness. The demands are the same, but circumstances have altered the media and the ideals and the means of expression.

DOMESTIC TRAGEDY & PROBLEM PLAY

BRITISH DRAMA

(iii) HARLEY GRANVILLE-BARKER

The career of Harley Granville-Barker began somewhat earlier than that of Galsworthy, his first play, The Weather Hen, written in collaboration with Berte Thomas, having been produced in 1899. His dramatic works include some delightfully fantastic pieces such as Prunella (1904), written with Mr Laurence Housman, and The Harlequinade (1913), written with Dion Clayton Calthrop, but he takes his place here by reason of four 'realistic' plays—The Marrying of Ann Leete (written 1899 ; acted 1901), The Voysey Inheritance (1905), Waste (1907) and The Madras House (1910). Each of these concretizes a dominant problem of social life. The first is a serious treatment of a theme dealt with amusingly by Mr Bernard Shaw. The life force, of which the latter speaks so often, is enshrined in the hearts of George and Ann Leete, who look with disgust upon the convention and hypocrisy surrounding the social culture of the time. In contrast with them we are introduced to Lady Cottesham, the elder sister, whose marriage of convenience has brought nothing but misery and soul-barrenness. The two younger people strike out against the domination of convention. George is the first to find a will of his own. Stepping from the highbred, and, let it be said, somewhat vulgar, surroundings in which he has been reared, he actually makes himself a rival to John Abud, the gardener, for the love of Dolly Crowe, a common farmer's girl. He is successful in his wooing, and, in the midst of universal execration, he marries her. Ann, meanwhile, feels the spirit of revolt burning in her breast. She is destined to wed the vacuous Lord John Carp, and it seems as if she will be dragged into a loveless marriage such as will please her father, when suddenly in the queerest way her whole being is illuminated. John Abud comes to bring the news that George's wife has brought a child into the world. What happens nobody can tell, but light flashes into Ann's heart, and, forgetful of the eminently desirable Lord John Carp, forgetful of parental wishes, she scandalizes every one by requesting the gardener to marry her. She has found her mate and she is freed.

DOMESTIC TRAGEDY & PROBLEM PLAY

This play, as is evident, has about it a touch of fancifulness, and was Granville-Barker's first essay in depicting "the secret life." At moments we might imagine that we are wandering in the dim-set garden of Prunella's dream-house, but the realistic purpose is evident. In it we find the fine expression of a certain realistic-fanciful art, difficult of attainment and rarely practised. In The Voysey Inheritance once more we come upon a theme similar to one of Mr Shaw's. Mrs Warren's Profession deals fundamentally with the same problem as that which Edward Voysey had to face. He is an idealist, and he hates his father's business and business methods. When the time comes that his father dies, and he is left with an inheritance which seems to him little else than misery, he is confronted with a difficulty similar to that which confronted Vivie Warren. He would rather go to prison than continue the sham. Granville-Barker's play emphasizes—not with one mighty sledge-hammer stroke, but by a series of mallet tappings—the sense of crushing, belittling imprisonment which he, along with other dramatists, felt in the life of his day, the seeming futility of higher ideals, the desire for freedom, the passionate spirit of revolt. The answer which he gives to his problem, however, takes the form of a compromise. Beatrice Voysey has battled out her own way to seeming liberty and has succeeded only in hardening her feeling, in making coarse her inner nature. In the struggle her soul has been seared as if society had sought to take vengeance upon her and had branded her with the brand of Cain. Obviously the author's real sentiments are given to Alice Maitland, who, standing beside and comforting the broken Edward Voysey, pleads for no extreme course. She sees as plainly as the others the misery and the squalor and the crass barrenness around, but, unlike the rest, she divines, clear-sightedly, that society will take its toll of any who strive too ardently against it, that in this civilization of ours it is our only way to rest content under many of the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune. The solution, therefore, while it is not definitely unhappy, has about it something of the despair of tragic art.

BRITISH DRAMA

In Waste, perhaps, Granville-Barker draws nearest to Galsworthy. The problem is here one of sex, which already its author had introduced as the main theme in his The Marrying of Ann Leete and as a subsidiary motive in The Voysey Inheritance. It is that of the woman with no motherly instincts faced by the philoprogenitive man. Fascinated by the outward beauty of Amy O'Connell, Henry Trebell, a brilliant young politician, falls in love with her. She is to have a child, but, unable to face the duties of motherhood, seeks illicitly to destroy it. The operation proves fatal both to herself and to her unborn baby. Meanwhile, her action brings disaster to Trebell. He is on the eve of great political advancement, but Amy's folly causes him to be politically ostracized. He is faced by cold looks, and his advance is stopped. The loss of the child of whom he had thought so much, and the blow to his political career, prove fatal to him. He sinks into despondency and despair, and in a moment of extreme misery commits suicide. The tragedy as a whole is full of the most impenetrable gloom ; hardly a ray of hope serves to irradiate the darkness of the life depicted. While in some ways the work is akin to Galsworthy's art, in many others it is wholly antagonistic to it. Galsworthy has little interest in sex themes as such; and in this play there is little or no appearance of these social forces which Galsworthy made his heroes. The play fundamentally is a domestic tragedy with Trebell as an individual hero. It is he who dominates the entirety of the work ; it is he, with his vast powers thwarted by fate, who gives majesty to the tragic conception. Here, if anywhere, we have in modern dramatic art a return to the Shakespearian type.

DOMESTIC TRAGEDY & PROBLEM PLAY

The Madras House returns rather to the problem of social forces. It is a much more complex play than any of the others, involving a greater number of prominent types in its folds. The Huxtable household at Denmark Hill introduces us to the slightly rebellious Julia and Jane, the more rebellious Philip, the conventional Mrs Huxtable, the miserable Mrs Madras, and the socially impossible Constantine. Nor is this the only field of action. Another sphere of interest is concerned with the firm of Roberts and Huxtable, with its prim Miss Chancellor and its rebellious Miss Yates, typical of a whole world of life independent of Denmark Hill, yet fatally linked to it. The Madras House, along with The Voysey Inheritance, is a damning indictment of certain spheres of modern life, and the indictment should, as Granville-Barker wished, cause us to think and ponder. In reality, however, the individuality of a single man can do nothing. The free independence of a Constantine Madras may win for its possessor a certain modified liberty, but that liberty, after all, is selfish. The higher idealism of a Philip can do naught against the deeply entrenched and heavily fortified forces of social custom and of social prejudice. Here a certain atmosphere as of Galsworthy's invisible presence comes to tinge the drama with its darkened shapes.

BRITISH DRAMA

Granville-Barker's theatre is a thing of its own, yet bound by many ties to the dramas of his contemporaries. He is probably a greater delineator of character than any of those with whom we have just dealt, and he has carried the realistic style to a further stage than they have done. His plays seem, even more so than those of Galsworthy, to be excerpts from life. The curtain rises, and we seem to be actually and not fictionally in the drawing-rooms of upper middle-class society. The dialogue is the dialogue of ordinary men, the native brilliance of Granville-Barker's style being restrained so that the naturalistic effect may be the greater. This produces a powerful atmosphere of its own; no man has succeeded better in reproducing in dramatic form that crushing littleness which dominated so many English homes in the nineties of the last century and which still, in those dismal realms called suburbia, exercises its baneful effect upon the many miserable beings cabined and confined in a prison which Edward Voysey saw was worse than Wormwood Scrubs.

(iv) JOHN MASEFIELD

The third great dramatist of the domestic school whose name was mentioned earlier in this chapter is Mr John Masefield, creator of The Daffodil Fields and of Reynard the Fox. Mr Masefield's plays are diverse in style, including not only The Tragedy of Nan (1908) and Melloney Holtspur (1923), but also poetic fantasia and experiments in classical decorum (Esther and Berenice, both 1921, adapted from the famous seventeenth-century tragedies of Racine). It is The Tragedy of Nan, however, that stands out chief among his dramatic works. Mr Masefield holds a peculiar position in the history of literary art. Gifted with a high imagination, he is by spirit sternly classical; endowed with passion, no man is more clear-sighted and logical than he; full of the fantasy of the poetic genius, he is a confirmed realist; clinging tensely to the natural world, he is wrapped in the spirit of mysticism. All of these apparently conflicting qualities, moulded together by his creative genius, are traceable in The Tragedy of Nan. The story is one of unflinching 'realism.' All the cold atmosphere of a rustic setting is wrought into its scenes. Nan herself is the child of a man who, before the action of the play begins, has been hanged for stealing a sheep. Stained with this disgrace, she lives, a veritable outcast, in the house of her uncle, Pargetter. Slowly, yet with resistless force, the tragic story develops. Nan gives her heart to Dick Gurvil, who, being a selfish, sensual creature, is easily led away from her by Mrs Pargetter. Broken, Nan stands lonely as a truly tragic figure, companioned only in spirit by the half-mad old Gaffer, whose meanderings add a touch of high passion to the theme. Listening to him, Nan's soul becomes wrapt in the melody of thoughts high above the wearisome weakness of Pargetter, the cruel tyranny of his wife, and the fickle, passion-bereft egoism of her former lover. Life somehow takes an added beauty out of her despair, and the roaring of the Severn waters sounds like that music of the spheres of which all earthly music and all earthly passion are but dim echoes, taking their form and substance from something more vast and more universal than themselves. We may, if we will, cavil at the form of speech given to the Gaffer, yet hardly any scene in modern drama is more effective than that in which Nan, her spirit broken yet victorious, gives ear to his lonely, heart-dulled wanderings :

DOMESTIC TRAGEDY & PROBLEM PLAY

Gaffer. The salmon-fishers'll lose their nets to-night. The tide'll sweep them away. O, I've known it. It takes the nets up miles. Miles. They find 'em high up. Beyond Glorster. Beyond 'Artpury. Girt golden flay-flowers over 'em. And apple-trees a-growin' over 'em. Apples of red and apples of gold. They fall into the water. The water be still there, where the apples fall. The nets 'ave apples in them.

Nan. And fish, gaffer ?

Gaffer. Strange fish. Strange fish out of the sea.

Nan. Yes. Strange fish indeed, gaffer. A strange fish in the nets to-morrow. A dumb thing. Knocking agen the bridges. Something white. Something white in the water. . . .

The restraint and the imaginative passion of Mr Masefield's genius are well-nigh perfect.

In The Tragedy of Nan Mr Masefield has created the greatest modern example of that form of domestic tragedy which found its first masterpiece in Heywood's A Woman Killed with Kindness. There is here little employment of social purpose. The play certainly gains an added grandeur by its use of heredity as a fatal force, consuming children's lives for the sins of their parents, but fundamentally it is a drama of domestic life and character. It takes its chief majesty from the dramatis personæ introduced into it. Perhaps the figure of the Gaffer and the many passages of purely poetic utterance are significant, indicating that every masterpiece of this kind of domestic tragedy must introduce something of a supernatural and imaginative cast. Unless this be done the ordinary nature of the theme chosen will lead toward a merely sordid note. In high tragedy we require to be raised out of the world in which we spend our days into a realm of clearer imagination, of nobler passion, of more poetic experience.

Periodically, during his varied career as a playwright, Mr Masfield has returned to domestic drama, unfortunately not with the rich inspiration which fired The Tragedy of Nan. The Campden Wonder (1907) and Mrs Harrison (written 1906) are both unrelieved bourgeois tragedies, but neither has a spark of that light which irradiated the other play. Melloney Holtspur is more of a drame, and to a certain extent is weakened by the direct introduction of supernatural forces. The belief in spiritualism, fervently preached by Sir Arthur Conan Doyle and by Professor Sir Oliver Lodge, found a certain home in the hearts of many people during and after the Great War years, and that belief has been reflected in more than one play of this period. In introducing their spirit forces, however, the dramatists have often forgotten that art, particularly that form of art which deals with the supernatural world, is successful only in so far as it is suggestive. No ghost ever succeeded in raising so much of that "willing suspension of disbelief" which is this art's true end and aim as an allusion or delicate hint at supermundane forces has done. Frankly, few can believe in the ghost-forms of Melloney Holtspur and Lonny, her faithless lover. The human, earthly story unfolds itself excellently, and we are shown the almost tragic passion of Lenda Copshrews and of Bunny Mento with intense power. When the scene changes to previous times, however, and when Melloney Holtspur, leaning, like Rossetti's blessed damozel, out of the bars of her spirit world, gives her blessing to their love, we cease to believe in the reality of the picture. It must be confessed that the author has succeeded in the technical welding together of the two worlds, and has, in doing so, given many suggestions to playwrights of the future, but somehow even the most powerful imagination cannot conceive the possibility of a live Mrs Copshrews re-enacting, along with a couple of ghosts, her tragic story. Melloney Holtspur is a peculiarly entrancing play, full of subtle symbolism and deep thought. Technically it is magnificently developed. At the same time, it cannot be held to be one of the greatest dramas of our century. Mr Masefield's masterpiece still is The Tragedy of Nan.

DOMESTIC TRAGEDY & PROBLEM PLAY

(v) ST JOHN HANKIN AND OTHERS

Many other dramatists of those years took up as their province Sir Arthur Pinero's pathetic drama, H. A. Jones' harder problem play, the tragedy of social forces elaborated by John Galsworthy, the realistic drama of Harley Granville-Barker, or the poignant domestic tragedy of Mr Masefield. C. Haddon Chambers, who first appeared with One of Them in 1886, is decidedly a follower of Sir Arthur Pinero. Among the several plays which he produced between 1886 and 1917 the best is undoubtedly The Tyranny of Tears (1899). Although technically a comedy and although introducing no novel or revolutionary ideas, this drama, with its easy style innocent of any of those tense situations which Jones so freely and so strikingly introduced into his plays, seems to mark an advance in dramatic technique; Chambers has here taken the Pinero-Jones methods and treated those in a subdued and quietened manner. Another playwright whose style is indebted to those two dramatists is Alfred Sutro, in whose work the serious treatment of social life is coloured by the prevailing sentimentalism of approach. In John Gladye's Honour (1907) he deals with the problem of a strong business man who finds the affections of his wife alienated by an attractive artist ; in The Builder of Bridges (1909) the story tells of the affection aroused in the breast of a great-souled engineer by a girl who has first approached him with the intent to trick him. Sutro, like Jones, apparently believes in the heroic passion ; the silent strong man of the David Remon type is his ideal.

Numbers of others trod the same paths. Among these one of the chief is St John E. C. Hankin, whose death occurred in 1909. The Two Mr Wetherbys (1903), The Return of the Prodigal (1905), The Cassilis Engagement (1907) and The Last of the De Mullins (1908) will always entitle him to fame as a writer of the serious play. Hankin, like most of his contemporaries, was a dramatist of ideas. All his plays throw a searching light upon the society of his age, and from his ideas his characters and incidents spring. This it is which causes a certain flaw in his art. Hankin knows human nature in the mass, but he cannot divine the true inner workings of the human heart. His stage figures, therefore, seem to us rather invented than felt. This impression is strengthened by the failure of the author in regard to the depiction of emotion. He always remains somewhat cynically aloof, an attitude which forms an interesting contrast to the stern-eyed kindness of Galsworthy. In general, we may say that all of Hankin's plays, well constructed as they are in the main, lack naturalism. They appear to us somewhat artificial in dialogue and in character-delineation, as if the writer were thinking more of the stage than of truth to reality. Whatever detailed portraits he introduces of English life, we feel that he has in some way or another falsified those portraits in his straining after effect.

Hankin's chief merits lie in his amusing cynicism, which reveals itself in a manner not similar but analogous to that of Mr Bernard Shaw. How delightful is the topsy-turvydom of The Two Mr Wetherbys, where James Wetherby, conventional and striving to feel affection for his wife when their whole lives lie apart, is faced with the problem of persuading that wife to stay with him, and where Richard Wetherby, who has broken from his matrimonial ties, is embarrassed by his wife's desire to return to him. The same cynicism is apparent, too, in The Return of the Prodigal, in which the rascal who has squandered his patrimony in Australia proves to his horrified father and jealous, if justifiably indignant, brother that he has a right to be maintained by them, and goes off in triumph with his two hundred and fifty a year. In The Cassilis Engagement we are nearer the sphere of the drame, although again the cynicism brings the play rather into the category of comic drama. The story is one of caste. Young Geoffrey Cassilis has got engaged to a frivolous adventuress named Ethel Borridge. His mother, horrified, plans to break off the engagement, but, knowing that opposition will but forge the bonds tighter, she invites Mrs Borridge and Ethel to her house in the country. There Mrs Borridge's vulgarity becomes apparent, and Ethel, bored to death by the rural life, herself casts Geoffrey off. Nowhere is Hankin's lack of sympathy and satirical bent more clearly displayed. His lash falls on all. If Mrs Borridge is vulgar and self-seeking, Mrs Cassilis is snobbish and deceitful; if Ethel is shallow and trivial, Geoffrey is a fool. Hankin's world is a world of social vices rarely relieved by the presence of any virtues.

DOMESTIC TRAGEDY & PROBLEM PLAY

This cynicism, however, was to a certain extent dissipated in his last complete play, The Last of the De Mullins, another drama on the theme of caste and convention. Once more we are introduced to what is dealt with by so many of our modern dramatists, the belittling and soul-destroying forces of social tradition. They are revealed here in the house of the De Mullins, where Hester lives a life of unmitigated mental depression. So, too, we are confronted with the spirit of revolt, incarnated in Janet, who has gone out to earn her own living and who is guilty of bearing an illegitimate child. Here the moral is not, as with Granville-Barker, that the struggle for liberty sears the soul, for Janet is not a Beatrice. She has won her independence, having paid deeply for it, no doubt, in many privations and in many heart-burnings, but content and glad that she has cast off the fetters which she sees only too clearly binding the soul of her sister. This drama contains less of the omnipresent cynicism of Hankin's other work, but even here it is present in the portrait of Janet. Among the twentieth-century dramatists Hankin will always take a prominent place, but his lack of human sympathy will ever put him on a lower plane than those other playwrights with whose work we have just been dealing.

The depressing existence of the middle classes has been treated by other dramatists. Of these one of the most penetrating in the analysis of social conditions has proved to be Miss Elizabeth Baker (Mrs J. E. Allaway), whose Chains appeared in 1909. Chains is a tragedy of London suburbia, behind the all-consuming misery of whose walls burns the fire of liberty and the desire for self-expression. In the play we are led into the little house of Charley Wilson, inhabited by himself, his moderately contented because unimaginative wife Lily, and a lodger, one Tennant. The last-mentioned, weary of London life, is about to sail for Australia, and his small belongings lie ready packed for his departure on the morrow. Suddenly, and without his being fully conscious of it himself, young Wilson finds himself dissatisfied with his surroundings. London seems to be fettering him, and he would snap the chains round him in order to escape. A wild spirit of revolt surges through his being. After a period of arguing and questioning he decides to depart with Tennant. Plans are arranged, and all seems settled, when it is discovered that Lily, his wife, is to bear him a child. The gates of freedom are closed, and there remains only the prospect of the "old grey solitary nothingness," the drab surroundings and the continual daily grind at the dingy office-desk. Here once more we come upon a Galsworthian drama, one to which not the characters, but the circumstances and the forces of society give greatness. Poor as the characters are, moreover, when considered in the light of great ideals and high purpose, they are subtly portrayed, and the contrast between the quietly contented soullessness of Lily and the incipient imagination of her husband is delicately handled. We are here in the presence of life not as expressed by an Ædipus or an Othello, but by London commercialism and suburban drabness and convention.

DOMESTIC TRAGEDY & PROBLEM PLAY

This drama of Chains was followed by its authoress with a number of more trivial pieces, among them Cupid in Clapham (1910) and Edith (1912); the note of dramatic intensity was not struck again until the appearance of The Price of Thomas Scott (1913), a play originally produced at Manchester. This second experiment in the realm of the domestic drama, although introducing stronger characters, is hardly so fine in its atmosphere as Miss Baker's first play. It seems to deal almost exclusively with the barren in life, introducing for us no escape from the drab and the sordid. Thomas Scott himself, puritanical fanatic, is a fine figure, and his dilemma when he finds that he has sold his property to what he hates most, a company financing a dancing-hall, is powerfully delineated. The conclusion of the drama, too, rises to a height of intensity, when the hard idealist flings back what he regards as tainted money, the money of sin. The Price of Thomas Scott is a rather depressing play, more depressing than Chains, even in spite of the thwarted ambitions and the unrelieved middle-class misery of the latter. No drama of the finer sort can be without some element of hope and of larger life, and somehow this last story of hardness and fanaticism fails to give it to us.

The domestic problem play, veering to the sphere of tragedy, has been adopted by several other women writers besides Miss Baker. Miss Clemence Dane has given us, in addition to her much discussed, much vilified, but well-wrought Will Shakespeare (1921), a study of domestic questions in A Bill of Divorcement (1921), and Miss K. Githa Sowerby (Mrs John Kendall) won a deserved literary success in her first play, Rutherford and Son (1912). The story here is again one of industrialism and hardness of heart. The glass factory which he has built up is John Rutherford's only love. His whole life is centred in that, and no human tenderness can break down the iron barriers which he has placed on his sympathy and emotions. His sons drift away from him. He can understand neither the clergyman

BRITISH DRAMA

Richard nor the weak-willed John. Janet, his daughter, seems to him also a being apart, and when she stoops to marry Martin, the foreman at the works, his anger blazes forth, and she is sent from his house. Only in the end is his pride humbled and his heart a trifle softened. To him comes the deserted wife of his son, Mary, a being of sensitive feelings and acute intellect. She lays before the old man his own grandchild, who may one day take his place as master of the factory. Broken by his own loneliness, perhaps, unconscious though he be of it, yearning for some human sympathy, he takes Mary back as his daughter, and the play is ended by the cry of a child. Bleakness, barrenness, hardness, dominate this drama ; misery surrounds the seeming prosperity of the Rutherford home. Civilization has exacted a cruel toll from its own creators. It is this sense of the forces of social life, added to the grim majesty of John Rutherford, which gives this play its intensity. It is unquestionably one of the finest of those many dramas which deal with the depressing conditions of modern life. A broader spirit breathes from it, and its creator has succeeded in adding to that broader spirit by the employment of the Northern landscape to form a symbolic background for the human actors who play their miserable or noble parts in the development of the action.

Among the pre-War dramatists who took up this style none is more noticeable than Stanley Houghton, author of a number of fine comedies as well as of The Younger Generation (1910) and Hindle Wakes (1912). Like The Price of Thomas Scott, the first of these plays is a study of the soul-deadening effects of puritanism, although the picture is not painted in such hard colours as is that of Miss Baker's play. The theme is treated rather in a cynical than in a tragic manner. Kennion, the father, has not the stuff in him which makes a Thomas Scott. He is a well-meaning parent, full of the puritanical views of his class, but neither stern nor entirely lacking in sympathy. All sorts of excess, however, he regards as savouring of sin, and he has a quite definite moral code of his own, which he wishes to be followed by his children, but against which they one and all rebel. It is perfectly natural that he should be horrified when Arthur comes rolling back home one evening in a state of drunkenness, insisting, in the confusion of his spirits, on kissing Maggie, the maid. The climax of the play comes when Kennion himself is forced to lie concerning his own youthful misdemeanours. It is the case of the pot and the kettle over again, told in terms of middle-class English life. As a whole, the play fails because of a discrepancy between aim and means. The theme is a serious one, and many portions border on the realm of that type of drame which in its turn is near to tragedy, but the situations become at times almost farcical, and a cynical mood pervades the entirety of the play. If Kennion himself is a man lacking in sympathy for the desires, which he regards as the sins, of youth, Arthur, his rebellious son, is a sufficiently weak-minded creature, and Richard, his brother, is nothing but a flabby clerk desirous of something beyond the ordinary routine of a city office. The play therefore falls between the serious drame and comedy, so that we feel a certain dissatisfaction in reading or witnessing it. Once more we reach the old problem of the mixing of the 'kinds' of literature. Houghton's play deals with two distinct worlds, and he was not such a genius that he could fuse those two together into a novel whole.

DOMESTIC TRAGEDY & PROBLEM PLAY

Much finer, because cast more in one dominating and all-pervading mood, is Hindle Wakes, which deals with the question of youthful revolt from another angle. The problem arises from the fact that Alan Jeffcote, son of a hard-working, honourable factory owner, spends a week-end at a sea-coast town with Fanny Hawthorn, a girl brought up in comfortable but uninspiring surroundings. He, being a luxurious young idler, looks upon the escapade as a 'lark'; so does she, with the difference that it is for her a gesture of revolution. She has dared to break the rigid fetters of a conventional morality, and is free. The climax of the drama lies in the consequences of this. Both the parents of the girl and the parents of the man agree that the two must marry, and Alan, a marrowless creature, is brought to comply. Fanny, however, to the horror of every one, refuses point-blank. Alan is not the man she would choose. The play ends in a set of cross-purposes and an unsolved problem. Obviously Fanny is of the modern age, a sister of some of Mr Shaw's heroines, eager for independence of thought and of action. She is the spirit of the twentieth century striving to fight out a way against the traditions of the nineteenth. She is of the kin of Magda in Sudermann's Die Heimat, of Mrs Arbuthnot in Wilde's A Woman of No Importance, and of Freda in Galsworthy's The Eldest Son. In spite of a clear exposition and a capable development of the action in Hindle Wakes, Houghton's drama fails as The Younger Generation failed. There is something of a sordidness in his work, mingled with cynicism, and both serve to leave spectators dissatisfied. Efficient playwright though he is, he does not succeed in reaching the higher levels of dramatic utterance.

BRITISH DRAMA

More effectively, but with less atmosphere, Arnold Bennett and Edward Knoblock approached the problem play in Milestones (1912). The treatment of this drama is novel, and the problem dealt with is a serious one. The gradual progress from generation to generation with the retention of the same prejudices and the same emotions, even when expressed in widely different terms, is delineated with a sure touch worthy of the author of The Old Wives' Tale and the Clayhanger series. Mr Harold Brighouse, another novelist who is also a dramatist, has provided for the theatre a number of excellently portrayed Lancashire themes, although rarely has he reached the intensity of his early playlet, The Price of Coal (1909); and Mr St John Ervine has won deserved fame for his Belfast plays, in which he has striven to reveal in an artistic manner some of the sterner aspects of the puritan conscience.

(vi) ST JOHN ERVINE

Mr St John Ervine is among the greatest of these playwrights. His method is strictly realistic, but he achieves that higher note which is frequently lacking in the dramas of the others. Like Houghton he loves to deal with the hard conventions of a narrow society, loves to deal, also, with that perverted idealism which gave dignity to Miss Baker's work. Often, too, he includes with these things the forces of the present-day class-war, which cut across and confuse many of the older prejudices. Thus in Mixed Marriage (1911) he takes as his theme both the struggle of Catholic and Protestant and the struggle of master and labourer. John Rainey, the hero of the work, speaks in favour of a strike which he knows is largely engineered by Catholics, but finds his old Orange sympathies return to him intensified when he learns that his own son, Hugh, is engaged to a Catholic girl, Nora Murray. From this point the action of the play grows tense. Civil discord soon breaks out, soldiers are called in, and Nora falls, killed by a stray bullet. Perhaps part of the last act may appear somewhat melodramatic, but the dénouement is logically arrived at. The hatred of the Protestants and the hatred of the Catholics, confused and sometimes intensified by that class-war which is coming to assume ever greater and greater proportions in social life, give the background to a tragedy of human passions and succeed in raising these passions to a high level. The last words of Rainey, as he stands contemplating the ruin about him, have something of the majestic grandeur which is enshrined in the old father of Hebbel's Maria Magdalena.

DOMESTIC TRAGEDY & PROBLEM PLAY

A still greater success was won by Mr Ervine in Jane Clegg (1913), a drama which once more deals with the depressing and soul-destroying aspects of lower middle-class life. A whole world of miserable creatures is presented to us, from the vicious and weak-willed husband and his evil genius, Munce the 'bookie,' to the monotonous and tiresome old grandmother. As a drama the whole would have seemed too sordid and too depressing were it not for the figure of Jane Clegg herself. Borne down in many ways into the mire that surrounds her, she rises superior to her circumstances, a human soul filled with that divine fire which irradiates and consumes. No idle dreamer of things impossible, no fettered woman craving for independence and adventure, she is a stern realist, staring life full in the face and rising to the heights of her moral nature in the presence of disaster. She watches her husband's fall ; she looks through him and sees the meanness and the littleness of his character ; and, in doing so, she comes to realize her duty. In sending this weak, depraved, cringing creature from her house she is doing the only thing possible. In that moment she becomes truly tragic in her inner majesty.

With equal dramatic force Mr Ervine has painted for us the tragedy of John Ferguson (1915), another tale of middle-class life. The hero is a man hard, yet with a human understanding and a depth of sympathy in his nature. To save his daughter, Hannah, from a loveless marriage with James Cæsar he allows his farm to be taken from him. The strain is tremendous, but he rises superior to it, winning new strength from his losing yet victorious battle against fate. Meanwhile, fresh misery has come upon him. His own daughter has been seduced by his greatest enemy. Cæsar, weak though he is, plucks up courage to say that he will murder the villain, and goes out one night gun in hand for that purpose. In the morning he comes back, frightened and cringing, crying out that his will failed him in the darkness. But the seducer has been found murdered, and Cæsar is arrested. Money has come from Hannah's brother in America, and it seems as if, in spite of the terror of the preceding days, peace of a sort will come to John Ferguson's troubled spirit, when his son Andrew, who had hitherto kept silence, suddenly announces that it was he who had killed Witherow, that he cannot allow the innocent Cæsar to go to his death for him. Ferguson, after a moment of terrible doubt, understands him, and Hannah and Andrew pass out into the open bound on the terrible mission of confession.

There is the same strength in this play as there is in Jane Clegg. John Ferguson is a wonderful creation, a tower of strength, rude though he be, a man against whom the waves of fate may batter, but whose head remains, though bloody, yet unbowed. When we add to this brilliant portraiture the sense of fate which Mr Ervine has summoned forth by many a subtle touch, we must realize that in this drama we have one of the masterpieces of the domestic drama. There is no problem here; there is no employment of social forces as there had been in Mixed Marriage; but John Ferguson deserves to be ranked beside The Tragedy of Nan as one of the outstanding productions in this particular sphere.

DOMESTIC TRAGEDY & PROBLEM PLAY

It seems unfortunate that these three dramas, powerful and full of a restrained passion, should have been followed by The Ship (1922), a play which in no way rises to the level of the others. It may be interesting as an expression of revolt against the machinery which man has created and which is beginning to be the master of man, but the human characters introduced are not of the stuff from which Jane Clegg and John Ferguson were created. There is more, too, of an obtrusive didacticism in this work, which makes it rather a tract for the times than a drama. Tried by the highest tests it fails. With Mixed Marriage, however, Jane Clegg, and John Ferguson Mr Ervine must stand well in the vanguard of those modern dramatists who have abandoned the world of romance and have striven to give expression to the common sorrows, the common joys, and the common aspirations of life.

The greatness of Mr Ervine's work lies in his creation of stern and dignified characters. Few of his contemporaries can equal him in this, and, as a consequence, many of them rely more on incident and novel situation than on personality. Mr Ervine can afford to introduce the somewhat improbable rape of Hannah because we do not notice this in our awe at the tremendous dignity of John Ferguson, but others, more subtle perhaps in plot-drawing, can take no such risks. Dramatically effective, for example, is the poignant little one-act sketch of J. J. Bell, entitled Thread o' Scarlet (printed 1923). The sheer cleverness of the work cannot be denied. The sense of horror in it is wonderfully developed, but somehow we feel that this is 'Grand Guignol' drama, not tragedy. The true aim of tragedy, we have always to remember, is not merely the arousing of horror, but the arousing of terror and awe. Subtly Butters' guilt is shown to us, the playlet being in many ways a model of dramatic construction, but we are left with a feeling of dissatisfaction. The play is too clever to be real; it is a piece of artistry rather than a work of art. 'Stageyness' of a similar sort is apparent in the works of many other modern dramatists. It is present, in spite of their unquestioned strength, in the works of Mr Gilbert Cannan, and mars the otherwise excellent qualities of Charles McEvoy's David Ballard (1907), a realistic study framed largely in the terms of theatrical melodrama. There is a certain suspicion, too, of the same artificiality in some of the scenes of Change (1912), the once widely discussed prize-work of Mr John Oswald Francis. Change is another example of what might be styled the 'generations' theme, the theme which had inspired Granville-Barker's The Voysey Inheritance, Arnold Bennett's Milestones, and Miss Sowerby's Rutherford and Son, as well as foreign plays such as Turgeniev's Fathers and Sons.

A straining after novelty, which leads toward a kindred artificiality, is apparent also in Basil Macdonald Hastings' interesting drama called The New Sin (1912), the new sin being that of living on when one's decease may bring some joy or profit to others. The dialogue in this play is particularly good, and the subject, albeit a trifle recherché, is ably handled. Perhaps something of the same defect may be traced in Mr Cosmo Hamilton's The Blindness of Virtue (1913), where the question of sex education is freely dealt with. Indeed, there is a danger that the realistic problem drama may suffer from the same defects as those which appear only too plainly in the romantic melodrama of the mid-Victorian period. The style, when first it was introduced, had the advantage of being fresh, but, as it has developed, a certain stereotyped set of conventions has grown up even in what was primarily a drama of revolt, literary as well as social. It has become, that is to say, fatally easy to listen to provincial dialect and write it down, fatally easy to depict in some sort of manner the depressing middle-class conditions of England. Realizing this, dramatists have been forced to seek for new situations and for more surprising turns of plot, making their works, because of this deliberate and conscious search, more and more artificial in atmosphere. By 1920 mechanical composition had begun to infect this modern English realistic drama as it infected the drama of Sardou and of Boucicault.

DOMESTIC TRAGEDY & PROBLEM PLAY

(vii) IRISH DRAMATISTS

So far, in carrying the survey of drama up to the present time, nothing has been said of the remarkable renaissance of the theatre in Ireland. Not only was the London stage itself revived by the aid of Irish writers, for Oscar Wilde, Mr Bernard Shaw, and Mr St John Ervine all hailed from Erin, but the Abbey Theatre in Dublin produced a series of plays among which are to be numbered some of the true masterpieces of modern European dramatic art. The Irish theatre is in itself but the literary counterpart of that movement which brought Sinn Fein into birth, which gave an air of passionate idealism to the Easter Rebellion of 1916, and which has ended in the establishment of the Saorstát Eireann. The literary and political aspects of this movement cannot be separated. Some of the most promising of the younger writers gave their lives for their country, and W. B. Yeats, leader of the poetic drama, was himself a senator in the Irish Parliament.

Starting as the Irish Literary Theatre in 1899, the little band of enthusiasts who were determined to make the Irish drama a thing of high culture and of European repute soon moved (in 1903), with the aid of Miss Horniman, to the Abbey Theatre, forming there a centre of art such as we have not had in the whole of England. Here Yeats and Synge and Lady Gregory gathered about them a number of gifted authors; here flamed a torchlight of artistic excellence which became the model and the despair of many a writer across the Irish Sea. In form this new drama of Dublin was a development of English drama. The language employed was English, not Gaelic; there were many signs that the writers of it had taken inspiration from the more noted works of our long centuries of London playwriting. In atmosphere, on the other hand, the Irish theatre frequently veered away from the English stage. That imaginative idealism which has always characterized the Celtic races, that love of passionate and dreamy poetry, that only half-ashamed belief in the fairy world, the People of the Mist, all gave a particular tone to the plays produced at the Abbey Theatre. Yeats is a poetic dramatist, and Synge, writing in his peculiarly beautiful and imaginative prose, has little in common with the realistic playwrights of London. The chief account of the development of Irish drama will, therefore, have to be confined to that section of this book which deals with the poetic and symbolic theatre. At the same time there were a few who strove to introduce to their own land something of the realistic tone so popular among the English writers. Mr Ervine himself, who has been treated above as an English author, had many of his plays produced in the national theatre of Dublin, and men like Mr Lennox Robinson, Mr T. C. Murray, and Mr Padraic Colum depicted in sternly naturalistic manner the lives and passions and hopes of the Irish peasantry.

Mr Lennox Robinson's plays are of considerable importance. His first, and in some ways his most characteristic effort, The Clancy Name, was produced in 1908; his last serious plays, The Round Table and Crabbed Youth and Age, appeared in 1922. The Clancy Name is a somewhat bitter story of Irish pride. Mrs Clancy is an embodiment of all that tremendous passion for a family name which has characterized the clans of Scotland and the racial sects of Ireland for immemorial centuries. For her this name is as a religion. To sully it means death. To Mrs Clancy comes the terrible realization that her son is a murderer. He has killed a man in a quarrel. The body lies where no one may find it; but his conscience has been aroused. The deed gnaws into his very soul, and in his agony and distress he determines to own up, to give himself to the police. He is a weak lad, this John Clancy, but his whole being is consumed by horror, and all that his mother can say will not move him from his purpose. It seems that the Clancy name is to be for ever sullied by the exposure of this crime, when John, walking in the street, manages to save a child from a runaway horse and in doing so is himself killed. He dies a hero, and the Clancy name is saved. There is a certain straining of probability in this sudden ending. Runaway horses do not often thus accommodate themselves to murderers prepared to confess and go to the gallows. There is, too, a certain bitterness in the somewhat cynical conclusion, which detracts from the general impression received from the play as a whole. Apart from these things, however, The Clancy Name is a fine drama, and the figure of Mrs Clancy has the proportions of true tragic portraiture.

DOMESTIC TRAGEDY & PROBLEM PLAY

The Cross Roads (1909) is even more improbable, and here the improbability is not atoned for by tremendous passions and high fervour. The story of Ellen M'Carthy, married to a drunken brute and faced with financial ruin, all because she has given up the love of Brian Connor in her desire to help Ireland, is not truly tragic, and a decided note of artificiality breathes over the entire play. Harvest (1910) is another tragedy where probability is strained, and cynical bitterness tends to weaken the impression. The story is one of the evils of education. The teacher Lordan tries to instil into the minds of the Irish youth among whom he is cast some elements of learning and culture. Although he himself believes that he has been successful in his effort, we see that he has only made them dissatisfied with their lot. Instead of a life on the land, free if hard, healthy if toilsome, they pine for the gaiety of city life. Patrick Hurley has drifted away from his own home, grown callous by his contact with civilization. Mary, his sister, has become a prostitute, eager for the good things of life which she could not have from her wages as a typist. Bob Hurley is like Patrick, successful, but callous and hard-hearted. Jack has become a chemist's assistant, unhappily married. Ruin slowly creeps down on the little farm, where once had sounded happy laughter and the music of care-free joys. Lordan remains blissfully unconscious of the results of his teaching. He thinks he has done great things for Mary and Patrick, for Bob and Jack ; but the veils are raised for the spectators, so that only misery and hardness of heart are displayed. The thesis of the drama may have some truth in it. It may be, for example, that in isolated instances education of a peasant family has brought ruin and misery, evil and degradation; but we cannot generalize in great drama from the particular to the universal. It is as absurd to argue the completely vicious effects of education from a single failure as it would be to argue that because one railway train crashes with its human freight over an embankment therefore we ought to reprobate the railways and travel from London to Manchester on foot. Great drama constantly cries out for the universal in this way; nothing that is particular and isolated will satisfy its cravings for the larger and more general truths of humanity. So, too, great serious drama rarely if ever will permit the introduction of bitterness. When we listen to Lordan's words at the close of this play, followed by Bridget's "Amen to that," we feel that the author has been guilty of the same offence of which he was guilty in the last act of The Clancy Name. He has allowed cynicism to take the place of a higher, more humane, and kindlier tragic emotion.

BRITISH DRAMA

These three peasant dramas by Mr Robinson do not by any means exhaust his full scope. Besides them, and the excellent comedy The Whiteheaded Boy, he has penned a series of political dramas dealing with Irish aspirations. The first of these was The Patriots (1912), to be followed by The Dreamers (1915) and The Lost Leader (1918). Of these The Patriots and The Lost Leader are set in our own time. The former comes nearer to tragic intensity than any of the other dramas we have considered above, but once more Mr Robinson allows his cynical bitterness to mislead him. The story is one of a revolutionary, James Nugent, who in 1893 has been sent to prison for his participation in a political crime. In 1911 he returns, still full of hope, still full of energy, expecting to meet his old friends and share in their aspirations for a liberated Erin. But he meets nothing save coldness and chill greetings. For a time he cannot understand; he will not realize that this is so. He is billed to address a political meeting. Here, he thinks, he will at last be able to feel his heart beating with the old enthusiasm, feel his numbed limbs pulsing with the old life. He arrives at the hall, and there is no one there save the porter. Every one has gone off to see the latest film at the picture-house. The sense of darkness and of despair in the old man's heart is excellently portrayed, but once more the cynical touch is apparent. The porter, tied by duty to the hall, is only too glad to switch off the light and hurry away to the twilight of the films. Cynicism again ruins what might have been a great tragedy. The Lost Leader is a more peculiar and at the same time a more subtle play. It deals with the legend that Charles Stewart Parnell is, or was, still alive, living obscurely in some corner of Ireland. This Irish hero of past days is discovered, or is thought to be discovered, in a mean old innkeeper. The delicate touches by which the "willing suspension of disbelief" is aroused show Mr Robinson's fine technical skill. We do not know whether to believe the words of the old man, roused as out of a trance, or the disavowal of his niece, Mary Lenihan. Then comes the climax. The newly discovered Parnell arranges that a meeting be called on a mountain summit, where he will bring proofs of his identity. Political squabbling breaks out, and in the scuffle the old man is killed by a mis-aimed stroke. A few minutes later there arrive some of Parnell's friends, who can say nothing more than that in the features of Lucius Lenihan they can trace the lineaments of Parnell. Beyond the similarity they can aver nothing. As is evident, there is here again that cynicism which marred The Clancy Name as well as the other dramas, and there is, too, the evident artificiality of the plot. On the other hand, the cleverness with which the theme is handled makes this a truly memorable play.

394

DOMESTIC TRAGEDY & PROBLEM PLAY

In The Dreamers Mr Robinson turns back to the historical drama, telling of Robert Emmet and his rebellion of the early nineteenth century. Nowhere perhaps so clearly as in this play has been depicted the continual yearning and idealism of the Irish revolutionaries, and although cynicism enters in here too the action does not depend fundamentally upon bitterness. It is a sincere attempt to display the workings of fervent passion for a seemingly hopeless ideal in the midst of actual life. Technically The Dreamers is not so good a drama, its action being clogged and its characters not sufficiently displayed, but in atmosphere it is one of the finest, if not the finest, of Mr Robinson's works.

BRITISH DRAMA

Writing after the style of Mr Robinson's earlier plays, Mr T. C. Murray has provided us with some amazingly poignant realistic studies of Irish peasant life. The Wheel o' Fortune appeared in 1909, and was revised as Sovereign Love four years later. Birthright came out in 1910, Maurice Harte in 1912, Spring and The Briery Gap in 1918, Aftermath in 1921. All these plays are alike in taking their strength from careful observation of ordinary existence and from consistent naturalism in plot-development and in language. Fundamentally his comedies differ little from his tragedies; in both the darkness of real life is fully displayed. Thus his first play, a comedy, shows up the misery of mercenary poverty no less than do his more powerful tragedies Birthright and Maurice Harte. The latter deals with the drama that lies in thwarted ambition and misplaced hopes. Mrs Harte has determined that her son Maurice shall become a priest. He is a well-meaning and a brilliant lad, but one by no means fitted for clerical life. In torment of spirit he tries to persuade his mother that he cannot enter the Church, but all her proud spirit is aflame with ambition. Like a harsh shepherd she drives her unwilling son back. Anxious to do his loathed duty, he studies hard, but the mental toil and stress tell on him. His mind gives way under the agony of his seething thoughts, and he is brought back a lunatic. It is a terrible story of striving middle-class life in Ireland, but, because of the manner of treatment, it attains to something of tragic grandeur. Birthright is equally fine, although here perhaps there is too much of the sordid and the depressing. The story is a simple one, straightforwardly told. Hugh Morrissey, a fine young man, symbol of health and clean thinking, is a trifle out of touch with his rougher father's temperament. We gain the impression at the very beginning of the play that these two will never have anything in common. In the tragedy itself we are presented, therefore, not with a series of fortuitous accidents or incidents, but with the climax in a long tale of opposing natures. Hugh has to go to a hurley match and spend the evening at a dinner. It is not that he is dissipated, but he loves sport, and it is his duty, as captain of his team, to go there. The merrymaking of the players frightens Bat Morrissey's horse ; its leg is broken, and it has to be shot. Still more, a sow requires treatment and attention ; Hugh is not there to take his part in the work of the farm, and Bat and his duller son Shane are wearied with toil and watching. Shane has been destined for America ; his trunk is standing there ready packed, with his name in bold characters on the label. Angered beyond endurance, the father, in terrible accents, orders Shane to substitute Hugh's name for his own. On his return Hugh finds what has been done. He accuses his brother of plying underhand means to get him away from the farm ; the latter retorts that Hugh is drunk, and turns from that taunt to throw reviling words upon his own mother. A quarrel soon arises, and in the scuffle Hugh falls dead to the ground. In the simplicity of this drama lies its strength. There is a majesty in it shared by but few of these domestic dramas, and the sense we have that this is but the culmination of long-standing grievances and misunderstandings helps to bring the atmosphere to a requisite tragic height. Mr Murray here proves himself one of the most talented of modern writers.

396

DOMESTIC TRAGEDY & PROBLEM PLAY

With Mr Robinson and Mr Murray must be mentioned Mr Padraic Colum, whose first play, The Kingdom of Youth, appeared in 1902. As a representative of the realistic playwrights he will always be remembered as the author of The Broken Soil (1903 ; revised as The Fiddler's House, 1907), The Land (1905), and Thomas Muskerry (1910). It has been pointed out by several critics that in The Fiddler's House Mr Colum has captured something of Synge's elusive style. An air of imaginative beauty passes over the whole, so that things spiritual and things material seem to meet in a common harmony. At the same time Mr Colum's work is not by any means fanciful. His methods are at bottom as realistic as are those of his two contemporaries mentioned above. In spite of the poetry with which the character of Conn Hourican, the fiddler, is invested, he remains after all a rogue and a vagabond. The drama arises from this man's passion for excitement and drink. His loved home is the horse-fair, where he can get as drunk as a lord and play his enchanting melodies to a gaping and admiring crowd. For some years his daughter, Maire Hourican, has kept him at home by the sheer strength of her character, but the old man feels once more the call of the tap-room. Maire sorrows, but understands. With hardly a word she brings him his fiddle, the fiddle once known throughout the length and breadth of the country, known even beyond in far-distant towns, and with him she goes off to the 'Feis' at Ardagh. In some ways it is a sorry story, for Maire is a girl of high promise, in love with life and eager for love. Her heart is broken, yet she has found a new sympathy, and she attains, as do so many of the heroes and heroines of high tragedy, an almost resigned calm, a clear-eyed realization of the meaning of life.

BRITISH DRAMA

The Land has less of the imaginative power visible in The Fiddler's House. In structure it is a comedy, yet a comedy full of tragic import, another study in the theme of the old and the new generations. Ellen Douras has felt the call for the city, and with her lover, Matt Cosgar, she sets out for America, leaving almost broken-hearted the old father, Murtagh Cosgar, whose one thought is the land which he has broken and tamed for himself and his own. To the younger generation the land makes no appeal; their hearts are set on gay cities and the busy hum of men. The lonely cry of the curlew, the circling flight of the plover, the lowing of the cattle at eventime, mean nothing to them. What they will find remains unknown; but, after all, it is the unknown which tempts men, sometimes to success, more often to self-willed destruction. The song of the syrens is still with us, though Odysseus be many centuries dead.

In Thomas Muskerry Mr Colum has introduced another Conn Hourican in the person of the blind piper, Myles Gorman, and with the introduction of that character he has caught again something of the poetic imaginative essence of The Fiddler's House. The story itself is one of almost unrelieved misery, telling how the brutal and hard-hearted Thomas Muskerry dies on a pauper's bed, and is buried in a pauper's grave; but the piping of old Myles brings a note of poetry into the play. As we listen to his melodies we enter another world, and in the last act, when his ditties sound fainter and fainter as he passes over the moorland, we are insensibly led away from the depressing reality of life into another world of more beautiful, because more spiritual, presences.

DOMESTIC TRAGEDY & PROBLEM PLAY

What hope there is of further development in this style among Irish dramatists cannot at present be guessed. One may, however, hazard the suggestion that something of the quality which distinguished the earlier plays is vanishing. In his whimsically and bitterly effective The Moon in the Yellow River (1931) Mr Denis Johnston recaptures the old strength and interest, but, if one may judge from such more recent works as Mr George Shiels' The Rugged Path (1940) and The Summit (1941), the characteristic grace and joyousness, so potent spirits in the hands of those who originally established the Dublin stage as a force in the modern dramatic world, are being lost. Perhaps one of Mr Shiels' characters expresses a truth in saying that the old days were better when most Southern Irishmen were bound as brothers against the English: present-day Eire is maybe a trifle uneasy in its new independence, and its theatre reflects that uneasiness.

CHAPTER III

THE POETIC AND IMAGINATIVE DRAMA

VERSE DRAMA

WITH the prevailing of the naturalistic style and with the endeavour to utilize the serious drama for the purpose of expressing ideas concerning the fundamental problems of contemporary social life, it was but natural that the poetic play should cease to have much significance. At the same time we must remember that a romantic reaction to naturalism is to be found in almost all European countries during this period, and that the realistic theatre of Ibsen displays an increasing tendency toward the imaginatively fantastic and toward the symbolic. The Master-builder and The Wild Duck are thus far more 'poetic' than Ghosts; the plays of M. Maeterlinck were produced at the same time as saw the appearance of some of the most extreme experiments in the French realistic style.

In the eighteen-nineties this romantic reaction serves to explain the success of Irving's Lyceum management; the audiences were enthralled by the actor and they were charmed by the scenic spectacle, but the triumph of the Shakespearian revivals and of the poetic plays produced there was due at least partly to the unconscious desire of escaping from the naturalistic style so rapidly gaining in power. The pure poetic play, however, secured in England comparatively few major adherents during the thirty years from 1890 to 1920. In Ireland it attracted some of the Abbey Theatre authors, but here only one author of importance, Stephen Phillips, remained strictly faithful to the verse form. Phillips' first true success came with Paolo and Francesca in 1900; this definitely established him in the literary world, and his later plays—Herod (1900), Ulysses (1902), The Sin of David (1904), and Nero (1906)— although they drew attention to certain flaws in his work which in the first flush of triumph had passed unobserved, consolidated the position he had won for himself. Nowadays we can look back and see, in spite of a genuine knowledge of stage requirements, a vivid and melodious utterance, and at least some appreciation of the tragic spirit, many features in his plays which prevent their being placed critically alongside the masterpieces in this kind. The apparently brilliant dramatic power is seen to have much in it of the melodramatic; the characters seem not to possess that subtlety with which at first they were thought to be invested. Phillips, unlike some of his predecessors, had honestly studied the technique of his craft; his tragedies are well conceived and skilfully developed, but there is lacking that vital force or enthusiasm out of which alone tragedy may be born. From both the literary and the theatrical point of view his greatest achievement was Paolo and Francesca, and this play may serve to mark the virtues and the failings of his style. In it he has taken the poignant tale told by Dante and, preserving its beautiful pathos, has clothed it with life; much of the exquisite torment expressed in Dante's lines he has preserved. Yet, seen now, the play seems dull. Effectively Phillips has shown the soul-torn husband, adoring both lovers, yet raging with jealousy and hate; equally effectively he has built up the interest of each successive act; but with all this his tragedy fails to move us. The passions seem to be nebulous, and the words words that move us to no great emotions.

THE POETIC DRAMA

The principal failing of Phillips' verse plays is that they are old. He looks backward always and can think of nothing save the continuance of the worn-out nineteenth-century styles based on uncritical admiration of the Elizabethans. Nothing of true virtue could be born of endeavours such as his. He has had some followers, it is true; Mr Rudolf Besier's The Virgin Goddess (1906) is written in similar style, and even such a romantic piece as J. E. Flecker's Hassan might perhaps be related to his efforts. Hassan is much more vivid than anything Phillips penned, yet it too fails. Published in 1922 and staged the following year with gorgeous scenery and plentiful introduction of ballet and music, it revealed itself on printed page and in the theatre alike as lacking true dramatic strength. Fundamentally, it is but a Chu Chin Chow made more glorious. The Eastern setting may charm, but the characters are crudely drawn and the situations are forced. Perhaps a certain romantic intensity envelops the figures of Rafi, King of the Beggars, and the slave-girl, Pervaneh, but these cannot raise the whole to the levels of high art. The ridiculous buffoonery of Hassan, the unmitigated savagery of Haroun, the idealistic rapture of the poet Ishak, and the love-passion of the two forlorn figures whose tortured screams are heard in the last act make the poem a mere patchwork of heterogeneous elements without harmony and without form. Hassan, save for its poetic elements (not by any means always dramatic) and its definitely sadistic appeal, must be placed alongside and hardly above other Eastern fantasia, of which Edward Knoblock's Kismet (1912) was the best known and the most popular.

BRITISH DRAMA

Partly from the East, on the other hand, a new source of inspiration for the verse play came shortly after the time of Stephen Phillips. In the year 1913 a collection of English translations from old Japanese Nō dramas was published, and the success of these led to the issuing of a second collection in 1916. Here was opened before the eyes of the poets a new world. Hitherto Shakespeare's art had been all-dominant; now was discovered a strange and novel form of dramatic artistry which provided a completely new orientation. It is not, of course, to be assumed that many of the poets deliberately imitated the form of the Nō, although its style has been closely followed by Yeats and by Dr Bottomley; rather did the Nō style suggest methods of treatment and experimentation in realms distinct from that of Shakespearian tragedy.

The general influence of the Japanese Nō is, it would appear, traceable in Mr Masefield's later dramatic works. The Tragedy of Nan had been published in 1908, and that was followed by a prose play called The Tragedy of Pompey the Great (1910), in which the domestic field was forsaken in favour of the historic. Here the author's aim was clearly, on a higher plane, to contrast the idealism of Pompey and the realism of Cæsar. In Philip the King (1914) he turned back to a verse medium (the heroic couplet), and no doubt indicated the source of his inspiration by choosing a Japanese theme for The Faithful (1915). In fundamentally similar styles were written Good Friday (1917), A King's Daughter (1923), The Trial of Jesus (1925), Tristan and Isolt (1927), and The Coming of Christ (1928), in which a skilful combination of prose and verse, of dramatic dialogue and choral interludes, indicate the endeavour to strike out some new paths for the poetic theatre. While there is little of directly imitative forms, the general influence both of the Nō stage and of the ancient classical stage becomes at once apparent.

THE POETIC DRAMA

During his earlier career John Drinkwater too endeavoured to re-establish the poetic play as a dominant force in the theatre, working in an imaginative sphere before he essayed the historical themes by which he is now best known. His first important play, Rebellion (1914), and those which immediately followed—The Storm (1915), The God of Quiet (1916), and X = 0: A Night of the Trojan War (1917)—are all concerned with human passions of a romantic or fictional sort. The Storm is one of the most arresting of these. It reminds us in some ways of Synge's Riders to the Sea, by which it may not have been uninfluenced. The scene is a cottage in the mountains. Snow is falling, and the storm with every moment sweeps down more fiercely. Outside, Alice's husband is tending his flock. Old Sarah knows what it all means, just as Maurya knew. Nature is taking its toll of human lives. Out of the sweep of the wind and the lashing of the blizzard comes a strong, healthy tourist. All this is a jest to him. He has battled through and joys in the struggle. But for old Sarah and for Alice, vainly waiting, waiting till the searchers return baffled by the snowfall, there is nothing but misery. It may be good for the young traveller to laugh at his struggles, but the shepherd lies wrapped in his white cerecloth of snow, and for the women there are only tears left and sorrow.

BRITISH DRAMA

Rebellion is more allegorical and more legendary. In an ideal land there lives old King Phane, a tyrant, but a tyrant just to his own faith. The people are restive, and in the poet Narros they discover their leader. His songs and his words excite them to action, and a revolt is planned. But Narros is smitten with romantic love for the Queen, Shubia, and he deserts his companions at the most critical hour in order to meet her at a trysting-place. His inspiration is gone from the ranks of the rebels, and they are defeated. Narros himself is captured and condemned to death. Another and a more successful revolt is planned; King Phane is deposed, but with him goes Shubia, the Queen. Narros has achieved one of his ends, but that love which seemed to consume his whole life is shattered. The conflict of political passion with that more primeval passion of love is here well developed, and the drama takes shape as a struggle of eternal principles in the human soul.

X = 0 is likewise allegorical. During a night of the Trojan War two Grecian friends, Pronax and Salvius, and two Trojan friends, Ilus and Capys, sit on the outskirts of their respective encampments. The first scene introduces us to the former pair. It is Pronax' duty to go by night to the Trojan walls in search of human prey. He sets off into the darkness, more than half loathing his work, leaving Salvius deeply immersed in a book. The second scene shows us the wall of Troy. It is the duty of Ilus to prowl round the Grecian camp in case he may be lucky enough to stab some straggler. He descends by a rope, and leaves Capys singing a ditty. In the midst of it Pronax stabs him to the heart. The third scene shows us Ilus in the tent of Salvius. Silently he stabs the Greek soldier and makes his departure. A moment or two later Pronax returns, and talks as though Salvius were alive :

Pronax. What, still awake, and reading ? Those are rare songs,

To keep a soldier out of his bed at night.

Ugh—Salvius, sometimes it's horrible—

He had no time for a word—he walked those walls

Under the stars as a lover might walk a garden

THE POETIC DRAMA

Among the moonlit roses—this cleansing's good—
He was saying some verses, I think, till death broke in.
Cold water's good after this pitiful doing,
And freshens the mind for comfortable sleep.
Well, there, it's done, and sleep's a mighty curer
For all vexations.

[The sentinel passes.

It's time that torch was out—

I do not need it, and you should be abed. . . .

Salvius . . . [He looks into the tent for the first time.

What, sleeping, and still dressed ?

That's careless, friend, and the torch alight still. . . . Salvius . . .

Salvius, I say . . . gods ! . . . what, friend . . . Salvius, Salvius . . .

Dead . . . it is done . . . it is done . . . there is judgment made. . . .

Beauty is broken . . . and there on the Trojan wall

One too shall come . . . one too shall come . . .

[The sentinel passes.

CURTAIN

The fourth and last scene is silent. It presents :

The Trojan wall. The body of Capys lies in the starlight and silence. After a few moments the signal comes from Ilus below. There is a pause. The signal is repeated. There is a pause.

CURTAIN

Effective as these plays are, Drinkwater discovered later a still more effective medium for the expression of his ideas ; a consideration of his historical plays, however, must be reserved for a later chapter of this book. There, too, will be discussed the work of some other poetic playwrights, such as Dr Gordon Bottomley and Lascelles Abercrombie, who were also writing about this time.

The only other dramatist choosing this style who may be here referred to is W. B. Yeats, whose work belongs, of course, to the Irish literary movement and the Abbey Theatre. In many respects Yeats may be regarded rather as a lyrical poet than as a playwright ; his delicately fragile melodies and his esoteric mysticism alike tend to weaken the theatrical element in his dramas. In spite of that he remains, and will remain, one of the dominant European figures in the development of the poetic and symbolic play. Yeats' dramatic activities stretch from

BRITISH DRAMA

The Countess Cathleen (printed 1892 ; acted 1899), through his Four Plays for Dancers (1919 and 1921), to The Herne's Egg (1938)—nearly all on fanciful themes.

It is possible that his finest achievement in this sphere was his first, The Countess Cathleen. Like Synge, Yeats had to suffer a certain amount of hostility when his play was first produced. The actors, he tells us, had to face a very vehement opposition stirred up by a politician and a newspaper, the one accusing me in a pamphlet, the other in long articles day after day, of blasphemy because of the language of the demons or of Shemus Rua, and because I made a woman sell her soul and yet escape damnation, and of a lack of patriotism because I made Irish men and women, who, it seems, never did such a thing, sell theirs. The politician or the newspaper persuaded some forty Catholic students to sign a protest against the play, and a Cardinal, who avowed that he had not read it, to make another, and both politician and newspaper made such obvious appeals to the audience to break the peace, that a score or so of police were sent to the theatre to see that they did not.

In spite of little-minded and mistaken patriotic enthusiasm The Countess Cathleen has come to be regarded as one of the most beautiful poetic dramas of modern times. The story, as Yeats tells us, was taken from an Irish newspaper, where it was given as an Irish legend, but was apparently translated from a French tale. Famine is creeping over the land, and two Demon Merchants are wandering up and down buying souls for bread. The Countess Cathleen, majestic in her pity, offers to buy off the souls that have been bartered at the terrible price of her own. The Merchants, eager to gain so high a price, willingly consent, but they are thwarted in the end, for a divine pity takes pity on her own, and she is granted a heavenly crown. The drama is complicated by the presence of Aleel, lover of Cathleen, and singer of beautiful songs. His is the spirit of poetry, he is the lover of art :

Impetuous heart, be still, be still,
Your sorrowful love can never be told ;
Cover it up with a lonely tune.
He that could bend all things to His will
Has covered the door of the infinite fold
With the pale stars and the wandering moon.

THE POETIC DRAMA

It is his impetuosity and passion which give to the drama its last, fading beauty. The lines are so lovely and so characteristic of Yeats' poetic spirit that they may be quoted here in full :

Cathleen. Bend down your faces, Oona and Aleel ;
I gaze upon them as the swallow gazes
Upon the nest under the eave, before
She wander the loud waters. Do not weep
Too great a while, for there is many a candle
On the High Altar though one fall. Aleel,
Who sang about the dancers of the woods,
That know not the hard burden of the world,
Having but breath in their kind bodies, farewell !
And farewell, Oona, you who played with me,
And bore me in your arms about the house
When I was but a child and therefore happy.
Therefore, happy, even like those that dance.
The storm is in my hair and I must go. [She dies.]

Oona. Bring me the looking-glass.

[A woman brings it to her out of the inner room. Oona holds it over the lips of Cathleen. All is silent for a moment. And then she speaks in a half-scream :

O, she is dead !

A Peasant. She was the great white lily of the world.

A Peasant. She was more beautiful than the pale stars.

An Old Peasant Woman. The little plant I love is broken in two.

[Aleel takes the looking-glass from Oona and flings it upon the floor so that it is broken in many pieces.]

Aleel. I shatter you in fragments, for the face
That brimmed you up with beauty is no more :
And die, dull heart, for she whose mournful words
Made you a living spirit has passed away
And left you but a ball of passionate dust.
And you, proud earth and plummy sea, fade out !
For you may hear no more her faltering feet,
But are left lonely amid the clamorous war
Of angels upon devils.

[He stands up ; almost every one is kneeling, but it has grown so dark that only confused forms can be seen.]

And I who weep
Call curses on you, Time and Fate and Change,
And have no excellent hope but the great hour
When you shall plunge headlong through bottomless space.
[A flash of lightning followed immediately by thunder.]

BRITISH DRAMA

A Peasant Woman. Pull him upon his knees before his curse.
Have plucked thunder and lightning on our heads.

Aleel. Angels and devils clash in the middle air,
And brazen swords clang upon brazen helms.

[A flash of lightning followed immediately by thunder.
Yonder a bright spear cast out of a sling,
Has torn through Balor's eye and the dark clans
Fly screaming as they fled Moytura of old.

[Everything is lost in darkness.

An Old Man. The Almighty wrath at our great weakness and sin
Has blotted out the world and we must die.

[The darkness is broken by a visionary light. The peasants seem to be kneeling upon the rocky slope of a mountain, and vapour full of storm and ever-changing light is sweeping above them and behind them. Half in the light, half in the shadow, stand armed angels. Their armour is old and worn, and their drawn swords dim and dented. They stand as if upon the air in formation of battle and look downward with stern faces. The peasants cast themselves on the ground.

Aleel. Look no more on the half-closed gates of Hell,
But speak to me, whose mind is smitten of God,
That it may be no more with mortal things,
And tell of her who lies there.

[He seizes one of the angels.

Till you speak

You shall not drift into eternity.

The Angel. The light beats down ; the gates of pearl are wide.
And she is passing to the floor of peace,
And Mary of the seven times wounded heart
Has kissed her lips, and the long blessed hair
Has fallen on her face ; The Light of Lights
Looks always on the motive, not the deed,
The Shadow of Shadows on the deed alone.

[Aleel releases the angel and kneels.

Oona. Tell them who walk upon the floor of peace
That I would die and go to her I love ;
The years like great black oxen tread the world,
And God the herdsman goads them on behind,
And I am broken by their passing feet.

[*A sound of far-off horns seems to come from the heart of the Light. The vision melts away, and the forms of the kneeling peasants appear faintly in the darkness.*¹

¹ This last scene was slightly revised after the performance of 1899.
The variations are given in the Poems of 1912, pp. 315-319.

THE POETIC DRAMA

Before The Countess Cathleen first appeared on the stage The Land of Heart's Desire had been performed, in 1894. This is another union of the poetical treatment of peasant life and the world of spiritual presences. Bridget Bruin is representative of the matter-of-fact, hard-working world, completely out of touch with her son Shawn's wife, Mary, whose mind is filled with " foolish dreams " of

How a Princess Edane,
A daughter of a King of Ireland, heard
A voice singing on a May Eve like this,
And followed half awake and half asleep,
Until she came into the Land of Faery,
Where nobody gets old and godly and grave,
Where nobody gets old and crafty and wise,
Where nobody gets old and bitter of tongue.

Out of the woods comes a fairy child, and at its call Mary must go. She loves her Shawn, she loves the world, but she has heard the horns of the elfin troops, and her spirit departs to the land of dancing and joy, even in death. There is a sound of feet outside on the grass and many voices singing :

The wind blows out of the gates of the day,
The wind blows over the lonely of heart,
And the lonely of heart is withered away ;
While the faeries dance in a place apart,
Shaking their milk-white feet in a ring,
Tossing their milk-white arms in the air ;
For they hear the wind laugh and murmur and sing
Of a land where even the old are fair,
And even the wise are merry of tongue ;
But I heard a reed of Coolaney say—" When the wind has laughed and murmured and sung,
The lonely of heart is withered away."

Among Yeats' other dramas Cathleen Ni Houlihan (1902) seems the most arresting. Many of the rest, among them The Shadowy Waters (printed 1900, acted 1904, revised 1906), The Hour-glass (1903, revised 1912), The King's Threshold (1903), and Deirdre (1906), are full of beautiful poetry, but all suffer from the defects of his still more recent works in making lovely verse the prime agent in securing his effects. Action becomes lost under a shimmering mist of delightful words. Cathleen Ni Houlihan, on the other hand, tells a straightforward story—how in 1798 Michael Gillane is preparing to marry the girl he loves, Delia Cahel, and how an old crone enters the cottage and with her words fires the heart of Michael. As it came to Mary Bruin, so the call of spiritual life has come to him and he must go. In spite of all pleadings he steps out of the cottage, heedless of their words, and the voice of the old crone can be heard outside. But she is no woman, this strange figure; she is Cathleen Ni Houlihan, symbol of Ireland herself, and when they look out of the cottage door they see that she has become transformed. Instead of an old crone she has become “a young girl, and she had the walk of a queen.”

BRITISH DRAMA

All of Yeats' dramas suffer from too great lyrical fervour and from a lack of action; yet they are unquestionably among the finest poetic plays of our time. Their union of reality and of spiritual things, their note of dreamy beauty, their pre-eminent mysticism, place them in a sphere by themselves.

(ii) J. M. SYNGE AND THE IRISH SCHOOL OF IMAGINATIVE DRAMATISTS

Whatever of beauty has been secured by the utilization of verse as a dramatic medium in modern times, it must be evident that the age was not so fully prepared to welcome the pure poetic drama as had been the age of Shakespeare. Perhaps in this way J. M. Synge was more truly creative than Yeats, for, realizing the necessity of discovering some medium better fitted to convey to the ears of contemporaries the figures of the poetic imagination, he set himself deliberately to a task which has been of infinite service to his successors. Yeats, as verse artist, has taken over many of the forms used by his predecessors; J. M. Synge evolved a new form more closely in accord with the spirit of his age.

THE IMAGINATIVE DRAMA

Synge was born in 1871, but, leaving Ireland, it seemed as if he were to lose those talents which were marked in his brilliant youth. In Paris he wasted precious hours in the midst of a decadent Bohemianism, and, had it not luckily happened that Yeats, in the year 1897, stumbled upon him there, it is possible that his name now would be unknown. With the insight of true genius Yeats saw both his strength and his weakness, divined the good that was in him and his principal needs. Resolutely he counselled him, sending him off from the artistic and would-be artistic circles of the French capital, vitiated and over-civilized, to the barren stretches of moorland and mountain on the west coast of Ireland. After a few moments of doubt and perplexity Synge found his true medium. He listened to the peculiar intonations of the Irish peasantry, and suddenly discovered that that strange English dialect, all transfused with the poetic imagination of the Gaelic mind, formed a novel and beautiful medium for the expression of his thoughts and passions. He saw these peasants, lonely in the presence of the mountains and the moors, and he realized, as Wordsworth did before him, the natural majesty of their simple characters. He wandered over the barren stretches of heather, and listened to the ceaseless roar of the Atlantic on the storm-swept coast, so that there came to him some conception of the mystery of nature, and his heart filled with a sense of that darkness and depth and beauty which has always characterized the literary works of the Celt. His genius, however, was by no means wholly tragic. In the Aran Islands he still kept his grip upon reality, and, observing life, he was able to write his comic masterpiece, The Playboy of the Western World. In some ways this comedy is his most perfect work, but it has not the depth visible in the still comic, but more imaginative, little sketch In the Shadow of the Glen (1903), the deeply poignant Riders to the Sea (1904), the strange Well of the Saints (1905), and the majestic Deirdre of the Sorrows (1910). His mind is too full of the beautiful and the strong to give free expression to lighter laughter and merriment.

Riders to the Sea is one of the masterpieces of our modern theatre. It is simple, but grand in its simplicity. The scene is a lonely sea-coast cottage. Outside the ocean roars hungrily for its toll of human lives. Within Maurya sits remembering with bitterness its greedy tax-gathering, remembers the father and the grandfather and the four strong sons who have perished in the wild waste of seething waters. To her one son alone is left, and he will go to the horse-fair far off on the mainland. Maurya knows what it will mean; it will mean that men will carry in to her a dead son, snatched lifeless from the waves. So it comes to pass, and darkness settles down on the lonely cottage. The sea has claimed Maurya's all.

We are here in the presence of elemental things. The sea becomes a living force, a demon hungering after men; the figures in the cottage, weak as they may be in face of the physical power of the ocean, are titanic in their courage and grandeur. The tragedy goes back to primal emotions, to the struggle of man with nature. It is strong in its primeval intensity, the weakening force of civilization far off, distant, and unheard. The universality, the strength, the majesty, of this little work cannot too highly be praised, but these would not have taken such a hold of our hearts had Synge not gained a new medium in which to express his innermost feelings:

Maurya [raising her head and speaking as if she did not see the people around her]. They're all gone now, and there isn't anything more the sea can do to me. . . . I'll have no call now to be up crying and praying when the wind breaks from the south, and you can hear the surf is in the east, and the surf is in the west, making a great stir with the two noises, and they hitting one on the other. I'll have no call now to be going down and getting Holy Water in the dark nights after Samhain, and I won't care what way the sea is when the other women will be keening. [To Nora] Give me the Holy Water, Nora; there's a small sup still on the dresser.

[Nora gives it to her]

Maurya [drops Michael's clothes across Bartley's feet, and sprinkles the Holy Water over him]. It isn't that I haven't prayed for you, Bartley, to the Almighty God. It isn't that I haven't said prayers in the dark night till you wouldn't know what I'd be saying; but it's a great rest I'll have now, and it's time surely. It's a great rest I'll have now, and great sleeping in the long nights after Samhain, if it's only a bit of wet flour we do have to eat, and maybe a fish that would be stinking.

THE IMAGINATIVE DRAMA

[She kneels down again, crossing herself, and saying prayers under her breath.]

Cathleen [to an old man]. Maybe yourself and Eamon would make a coffin when the sun rises. We have fine white boards herself bought, God help her, thinking Michael would be found, and I have a new cake you can eat while you'll be working.

The Old Man [looking at the boards]. Are there nails with them?

Cathleen. There are not, Colum; we didn't think of the nails.

Another Man. It's a great wonder she wouldn't think of the nails, and all the coffins she's seen made already.

Cathleen. It's getting old she is, and broken.

[Maurya stands up again very slowly and spreads out the pieces of Michael's clothes beside the body, sprinkling them with the last of the Holy Water.]

Nora [in a whisper to Cathleen]. She's quiet now and easy; but the day Michael was drowned you could hear her crying out from this to the spring well. It's fonder she was of Michael, and would anyone have thought that?

Cathleen [slowly and clearly]. An old woman will be soon tired with anything she will do, and isn't it nine days herself is after crying and keening, and making great sorrow in the house?

Maurya [puts the empty cup mouth downwards on the table, and lays her hands together on Bartley's feet]. They're all together this time, and the end is come. May the Almighty God have mercy on Bartley's soul, and on Michael's soul, and on the souls of Sheamus and Patch, and Stephen and Shawn [bending her head]; and may He have mercy on my soul, Nora, and on the soul of every one is left living in the world.

[She pauses, and the keen rises a little more loudly from the women, then sinks away.]

Maurya [continuing]. Michael has a clean burial in the far north, by the grace of the Almighty God. Bartley will have a fine coffin out of the white boards, and a deep grave surely. What more can we want than that? No man at all can be living for ever, and we must be satisfied.

[She kneels down again, and the curtain falls slowly.]

Deirdre of the Sorrows is a different, but no less arresting, drama. Here Synge has taken for his theme one of the most poignant and deeply tragic of all those lovely tales of Celtic love and mystery, a tale which has been utilized not only by himself, but also by G. W. Russell and by W. B. Yeats. The story tells how Deirdre, betrothed to Conchubor, King of Ulster, whom she loves not, finds her mate in Naisi, son of Usna. Together the two fly to Scotland, and for seven blessed years they dwell in peace among the mountains of Alban. Conchubor still desires the beautiful Deirdre, and he sends a message of friendliness, bidding them return to Erin. Believing that all is well, they come back, and Conchubor, black treachery in his heart, slays Naisi's brothers, murders Naisi himself, and would seize Deirdre. Her spirit, however, is linked with that of her lover, and she dies with his dagger in her breast. No mere description can express the beauty with which Synge has clothed this legend. The dim figures, conceived in an ageless past and tinged with the roseate hue of romance, take life before us. We see the lovely maidenhood of the resolute Deirdre, waking to life when she hears the voice of her mate, Naisi. We see Naisi himself, strong and handsome, a fit mate for her. They know of the doom which hangs over their love, but they prefer the joy of some passing years to the endless misery of blasted lives. It is in the second act that Synge shows his full genius. When the messengers of Conchubor arrive Deirdre instinctively knows that the proffered friendship covers deceit and treachery. She would not return to her native land, and would persuade Naisi to remain in the mountains of Alban. But Naisi is not quite so completely filled with love as she. For her, love is everything. No doubt or question may enter in to break its tremendous intensity. Naisi, on the other hand, sometimes wonders whether after all this dream may not some time be shattered. Mayhap one day he would come to lose his love of Deirdre, and sorrow would consume their lives. Deirdre overhears his words to Fergus, and, true to her nature, she makes up her mind. They will return. Although death, she knows, awaits her, it is better to die when love is strong than to spend hopeless years in slow-consuming bitterness. They arrive at Conchubor's house. Naisi's brothers, far down in the woods, are treacherously set upon, and Naisi would go to save them. Deirdre knows it is death, and she tries to dissuade her lover, but he throws her off with cruel words. The canker of doubt, the canker of weariness, has poisoned his soul, and their love is nearly sundered. The tumult ceases, and Naisi is dead. Lonely Deirdre stands before Conchubor, when a new turmoil arises. Fergus, the messenger of Conchubor, angered at the treachery of his master, has set his palace in flames, but Conchubor can think of nothing but his desire of Deirdre. It is fitting that, in the midst of the flaming palace, she should put Naisi's dagger to her breast. She dies, as she had lived, his mate. It seems only a pity, but a tragic pity, that to those two death had not come even sooner, that Naisi's last words to her who had given all for his sake should have been words of cruel and bitter import.

THE IMAGINATIVE DRAMA

Synge's other plays are not so tragic as these. In the Shadow of the Glen is a peculiar little sketch of Irish peasant life, romantically and at the same time cynically treated. A little lonely cottage stands in a glen. Nora, the wife, is somewhat relieved when Daniel Burke, her husband, lays himself down on his bed of death. She is ill-suited to be a home-keeping housewife, and her emotions go forth to the wild moors and the grey road. For her these things are symbolized in the Tramp, to whom she gives her love. The Tramp and she sit chatting, jesting, and making plans, as Daniel Burke lies there in his cot by the wall. Nora, however, is not sufficiently in love with the Tramp, as a man, to keep herself from making advances to Mike Dara, who comes in to visit her. What success she would have had we cannot say, for the wife's newly found freedom is rudely broken by a sneeze from the corpse, and Daniel rises to confront her. He has only been playing her a trick, and now he knows her for what he suspected her to be. In rage he sends her out of the cottage, but she is content to go. The Tramp will be waiting for her down the road. This novel treatment of a theme used as long ago as 1701 in The Funeral gained for Synge an amount of opposition in Dublin. Here was an Irishman daring to suggest that any Irish wife could be faithless. Whatever Irishmen might say among themselves about Irish women, surely it was unnecessary to let all the world know that Noras might dwell in country cottages in the west. The opposition was inspired by political motives, but politics frequently make us lose our sense of humour, and we ought to be able to appreciate the cynical charm of Synge's play without generalizing to make it a common attack upon all Erin's daughters. Besides, apart from national associations, it is one of the most cleverly written and ably constructed one-act dramas of modern times.

The Well of the Saints is equally cynical, but more symbolic in import. Comedy and imagination meet here in one, Synge having captured the true secret of that elusive quality, humour. The theme of the play is splendidly fantastic. There is a certain well, belonging to a certain saint, the waters of which can make the blind see. To this well come an old beggar and his wife. They have never seen one another, but they believe one another to be beautiful. The saint gives them the gift of light, and suddenly each sees the haggard, withered visage of the other. Harsh words end in blows, and they part. Darkness settles on them once more, and by chance they stumble on one another. They start talking, and gradually their old companionship revives. The divine gift of laughter eases over their troubles, and they are about to set off on their united travels again when the saint reappears. He will renew their vision. The thought, which before had been full of happiness and hope, is bitter to them, and the old beggar can do no more than throw the goblet of blessed water from the hands of the saint on to the ground. Darkness with visions and hope is better than light with mental bitterness.

Synge's other drama, The Playboy of the Western World, can hardly be dealt with satisfactorily in this section. It is a realistic, if fancifully conceived picture of the Irish peasantry, and belongs wholly to the realm of comedy. Even in treating of In the Shadow of the Glen we have departed sufficiently from the normal development of the symbolic drama, and it is his contribution to this genre which is Synge's greatest claim to fame. In after times he will be remembered most for Riders to the Sea and for Deirdre of the Sorrows. His skill in the delineation of character, his style, his sense of majesty, make him a supreme tragic dramatist. It is not too much to say that in these plays this Irish author came close to the genius of Shakespeare. As the years pass he will unquestionably stand out more and more as one of the principal dramatic writers of our century.

THE IMAGINATIVE DRAMA

Of those other Irish dramatists who adopted something of the same style Edward Martyn claims particular attention. From his first effort, The Heather Field (1899), to his last works of the years just before the War he provided the theatre with several plays of sterling excellence and true beauty. He is the more remarkable because he united an unflinching realism, akin to that of the domestic playwrights, with a vivid poetic imagination. The Heather Field illustrates this well. Carden Tyrrell, the hero, is a poet in temperament. He sees things beyond the ken of mortal man, and his whole life is bound up in an ideal. That ideal takes the form of a desire to reclaim the broad heather-lands on his estate. His money goes steadily; day by day he strives, and day by day the moorland baffles him. He gets a mortgage on his land; too poor now to pay it off, he sees with misery that all has gone to naught. Perhaps even now, had he been able to go away, he might have died happy, for grass had been springing where the heather was. But it was not his fate to die in peace. His son Kit, playing in the fields, gathers a bunch of heather, and brings it in laughing to his father. It is from the field which he has been striving to reclaim. A cry tells us that his heart is broken, and darkness settles on his spirit. His mind is smitten, and he dies a lunatic. It is evident here that we have more than a mere domestic play. Apart from the prevalent idealism of Carden Tyrrell himself, we are faced with the symbolism of the whole theme, and the play consequently comes nearer to the spirit of Synge and Yeats than it does to the spirit of Ibsen and Galsworthy.

Maeve (1900) is even more inwrought with the poetic spirit. The fairy world here takes shape before us, and the story is the story of Yeats' The Land of Heart's Desire. Maeve O'Heynes is a replica of Mary Bruin; her sister Finola is the companion of the old Bridget. To Maeve as to Mary comes the vision of the fairy folk, of Queen Maeve who lives her spirit life in a moorland haunt and who keeps in her hands all permanent beauty. Maeve O'Heynes, again like Mary, hears the call of two worlds, and the one proves stronger than the other. Here, more clearly even than in The Heather Field, Martyn shows himself as one of the school of poetic and symbolic playwrights. An Enchanted Sea (1902; printed 1904) carries on his development of what may be styled the imaginative-realist drama. The fairy world is here represented in Guy Font, who is not wholly human; his kin are in fairyland, and his spirit is in the waves of the sea. From the sea he came, and to the sea he returned.

Martyn's real strength is seen to lie in this strange union of reality and of the supernatural. Few dramatists have succeeded as he did in welding together into a complete whole these two spheres. At the same time his art in general shows a certain want of orientation. If he is mystically inclined in Maeve, he sinks to sordid actuality in Grangecolman (1912). If his supernatural atmosphere is perfectly achieved in An Enchanted Sea, it is somewhat vitiated in the comic atmosphere of The Dream Physician (1914). His fame in the future will undoubtedly depend upon the peculiar idealistic spirit that inspired The Heather Field and Maeve. No other writer of this time, save perhaps Sir James Barrie, had quite the same power of uniting these two contraries, although in the works of Lord Dunsany a similar union, with a different purpose, is masterly attained.

The principal sphere of Lord Dunsany (E. J. M. D. Plunkett, Baron Dunsany) is the world of fear. He has, certainly, dramas which do not deal with this subject, but no man has excelled him in arousing, by delicate touches, an emotion of terror, sometimes of awe. The means at his command are a subtle treatment of Oriental motives, and an exquisite artistic fancy. An Irishman, he has separated himself from the school of Synge and of Yeats in finding no inspiration, or but little inspiration, in his native land.

THE IMAGINATIVE DRAMA

Because of the delicacy of his touch Lord Dunsany's prime métier is the short one-act play. His subject-matter frequently prevents him from handling satisfactorily the longer three-act or five-act form. Of his works several have singled themselves out as being of surpassing merit: The Glittering Gate (1909), The Gods of the Mountain (1911), A Night at an Inn (1916), The Queen's Enemies (1916), The Laughter of the Gods (1919), and If (1921). Many of these deal with the theme of grim justice or revenge. The Queen's Enemies tells how in ancient Egypt a princess, after feasting her guests, destroys them by flooding her underground banquet-hall. A Night at an Inn relates how retribution comes to the robbers of a god. This latter work is so typical of Lord Dunsany's style that it merits some analysis. The scene is a lonely inn, far away from the nearest human habitation, which has been taken as a hiding-place by A. E. Scott-Fortescue, known as "The Toff" by his companions. He, William Jones ("Bill"), Albert Thomas, and Jacob Smith ("Sniggers") have stolen a precious jewel from the eye of an Eastern idol, and three priests of this god Klesh have tracked them to England. It is the plan of the Toff to lure them to a deserted spot and there deal with them. His plan succeeds so far as is humanly possible. One by one the three priests are slain by his devices. All seems well. Down they sit to pledge their own healths, until Smith, who goes out to get some water, returns in terror. As they try to get the truth from him, the idol itself steps in, groping like a man blind, picks up the ruby, and moves off. For a time there is silence.

The Toff. O, great heavens!

Albert [in a childish, plaintive voice]. What is it, Toffy?

Bill. Albert, it is that obscene idol [in a whisper] come from India.

Albert. It is gone.

Bill. It has taken its eye.

Sniggers. We are saved.

A Voice off [with outlandish accent]. Meestaire William Jones, Able Seaman.

[The Toff has never spoken, never moved. He only gazes stupidly in horror.]

BRITISH DRAMA

Bill. Albert, Albert, what is this ? [He rises and walks out.
One moan is heard. Sniggers goes to the window. He falls back sickly.]

Albert [in a whisper]. What has happened ?

Sniggers. I have seen it. I have seen it. Oh, I have seen it !
[He returns to the table.]

The Toff [laying his hand very gently on Sniggers' arm, speaking softly and winningly]. What was it, Sniggers ?

Sniggers. I have seen it.

Albert. What ?

Sniggers. Oh !

Voice. Meestaire Albert Thomas, Able Seaman.

Albert. Must I go, Toffy ? Toffy, must I go ?

Sniggers [clutching him]. Don't move.

Albert [going]. Toffy, Toffy. [Exit.]

Voice. Meestaire Jacob Smith, Able Seaman.

Sniggers. I can't go, Toffy, I can't go. I can't do it. [He goes.] Voice. Meestaire Arnold Everett Scott-Fortescue, late Esquire, Able Seaman.

The Toff. I did not foresee it. [Exit.]

CURTAIN

Nowhere is Lord Dunsany's power of evoking a sense of the uncanny more clearly shown, yet there seems a flaw in this play. The atmosphere is perfect save for the idol. We are too materialistic nowadays to accept the possibility that an Indian idol may take motion and seek for vengeance, and although there is mystery in the calling forth of the names, we never forget the apparition. It might have been possible here to intensify the emotion of the play by making the idol seize the ruby from Sniggers when he was outside. The narration of the wonderful and the supernatural will always be more terrifying and awe-inspiring than the direct introduction of those forces. The same or a similar criticism may be levelled against The Gods of the Mountain, a strikingly ironical work in which some beggars, who impose upon a superstitious township, are themselves turned to stone.

Nearly all of Lord Dunsany's dramas hint at more than is shown to us, and symbolism predominates in plays such as The Glittering Gate. His greatest triumph has so far been that peculiar work entitled If, a fantasy which reminds us both of Edward Martyn's union of realism and the supernatural and of Sir James Barrie's Dear Brutus. The theme is, as with these plays, one of possibilities. "Let us," says Lord Dunsany in much the same spirit of fantasy, "let us imagine a certain John Beal, an ordinary, commonplace Londoner. Carry him back to any point in his life. Suppose he did something ever so little differently from the way he did do it. What might not have happened to him?" So we are taken back to an ordinary railway-station, and John Beal catches that train which he missed. Quite an ordinary thing, such as happens to every man. For Lord Dunsany, however, character is not destiny. Accidents too shape life, and John Beal is carried from one thing to another till he finds himself a chieftain king in the depths of Persia, wielding powers of life and death. Adventure surrounds him; he is grown from a commonplace business man into a being of romance. Sir James Barrie's Dear Brutus appeared in 1917; is it too much to suppose that If (1921) was written as an antidote to the former's philosophy of character?

THE IMAGINATIVE DRAMA

(iii) SIR JAMES BARRIE

The only other dramatist of eminence who approached this style of play during the period was Sir James Barrie. Clearly there is something akin between his spirit and that, say, of Edward Martyn, but he is distinguished from the latter by his gift of humour, by his sentimentalism, and by his satirical tendencies. Normally Sir James Barrie looks at the world through rose-coloured spectacles. A vein of sentimentalism blends with his whimsicality, and, if he is satirical, he is never bitter, though at times he may be trivial. He is a man who has done a great deal for the theatre, yet often we feel that he has not done all that he could have done, that he has not given us consistently of his best. If Peter Pan (1904) is a perennial delight, if The Admirable Crichton (1902) is a charming fantasy, if A Slice of Life (1910) is a delicious piece of literary satire, we feel that The Little Minister (1897) is little more than a sentimental romance, that Der Tag (1914) is a potboiler not in very good taste, that A Kiss for Cinderella (1916) is mawkish and weak, and that The Truth about the Russian Dancers (1920) has little beyond topical interest. The fact is that Sir James Barrie has exploited his vein of whimsicality too much, and that his sentimental humour, at first novel and fresh, has degenerated into being a literary trick. Some of his topsy-turvy conceptions are little short of being works of genius, but it is no good criticism which can profess to enjoy plays which obviously have nothing of value in them. Idolatry may be pressed too far, as we know to our cost by the vast and often foolish Shakespeare literature, and Sir James Barrie himself might, perhaps, be the first to acknowledge that many of his plays stand upon a plane infinitely lower than his true masterpieces.

Of these masterpieces Peter Pan comes first in popular esteem. So well known is this fantasy of the boy who never grew up that it would be mere waste of space here to analyse its plot or to criticize it in detail. It has captured the hearts of young and of old alike, and will no doubt remain for many years a successful stage play. The Admirable Crichton (1902) presents a realistic counterpart. Instead of a fanciful theme, the author introduces us to an almost normal aristocratic English household, which is disturbed only by Lord Loam's queer endeavours to establish a common ground between his servants and himself. If Lord Loam is eccentric, Crichton is a perfectly model butler, cool, polite, and polished. Imagine these men, says the author, cast on a desert island, and in Lear's words, "Handy-dandy, which is the justice, which is the thief?" Lord Loam and his aristocratic relations prove themselves utterly useless; it is Crichton who alone possesses the requisite presence of mind and handiness. It is he who makes a camp-fire, he who builds a shelter, he who finds food. And, in doing all these things, he becomes the aristocrat. He is master of the situation. Gradually Lord Loam and the others, chilled in the darkness of the night, creep back to the fire and accept the altered conditions. Two years they stay there, and Crichton is just about to bestow his now royal hand on Lady Mary when civilization returns in the shape of a rescue ship. They are all carried back to London. Lord Loam assumes his old position, and Crichton once more plays the part of the model butler. It is this power of conceiving changed conditions, of imagining the silk-hatted, frock-coated Parliamentary Minister in corduroys and slouch cap, which gives to Sir James Barrie's works their chief charm and fascination.

THE IMAGINATIVE DRAMA

This topsy-turvydom and queer blending of two worlds appears in an altered form in his more recent works Dear Brutus (1917) and Mary Rose (1920). In the former a group of ordinary people are shown to us lamenting that they might, in other circumstances, have been this or that. Let us, says Sir James Barrie, imagine what would have happened had some sprite been at hand to give them their wish. So we see them all in other circumstances, such as they might have lived in had fate given them what they desired. But hardly anything is changed. After all, they remain what they were. Character, says the author, is the only destiny. Mary Rose makes even greater use of the supernatural. Here Celtic legend has been called in, and Mary Rose, like that other Mary, her namesake in The Land of Heart's Desire, is carried away to the land of the fairies. This play is, however, irretrievably ruined by the hopeless materiality of the ghost introduced in the last scene. More realistically the same blending of forces appears in The Will (1913), where a single man is shown at three stages of his career at a moment of crisis.

Less of this quality is apparent in the better-executed What Every Woman Knows (1908), a tale of woman's influence on man, and in Quality Street (1902), a subtle study of quiet age. Nor does it make its presence felt in the delicately worked one-act puzzle, Shall We Join the Ladies? (1922). In all of these, as in Barrie's other dramas, the preponderating element is that of the sheer cleverness of the author. Even when the sentimentalism intrudes most artificially we feel the presence of his subtlety and his intellectual skill. Such a work as Alice Sit-by-the-Fire (1905), with its good-humoured satire of stage tricks and its delightful picture of Amy and her mother, is perfect for its sheer precision and waywardness. This subtlety and the other-world fantasy presented in some of his plays are the qualities which make Sir James Barrie at once typical of his age and a pioneer in a new dramatic style. While he has few direct followers he has taught many lessons to the English playwrights of to-day, and the symbolic drama owes much to him. At the same time his appeal is largely to the sentimental. There is little that is strong in his work, and we are inclined to feel that his contributions to the theatre fail beside the trenchant comedies of Mr Bernard Shaw.

His is an inspired, imaginative ordinariness ; he shows the common man what the common man thinks he ought to be. Sir James Barrie's work is refined and restricted. Positive evil he will not introduce ; the evil in What Every Woman Knows and Dear Brutus is potential only, the stage-direction in Alice Sit-by-the-Fire is characteristic : "He is very young—too young to be a villain, too round-faced ; but he is all the villain we can provide for AMY." This is the result of his sentimental picture of life. Sir James Barrie will weep tears alike over a ghost and over ten little pink toes ; he will proceed, in Pantaloon (1905), to sentimentalize the characters of the commedia dell' arte. In the last-mentioned play, when the author declares of Columbine that "it would be cruel to her to make her [Pantaloon's] wife because then she could not have a love-affair," the only comment of those who know the real Colombina is a cynical inquiry as to the reason of her inability to indulge in such flirtations.

CHAPTER IV

THE REVIVAL OF COMEDY AND THE THEATRE OF G. B. SHAW

WILDE AND THE COMEDY OF MANNERS

SERIOUS drama and comedy always flourish together : Greece had its Aristophanes as well as its Æschylus, and Elizabethan England found in Shakespeare a master of comedy and tragedy alike. It is not surprising, therefore, that those years which witnessed the development of the serious problem drama should have seen as well the revitalization of the play of laughter. The authors of this period are not so gloomily or so idealistically sombre-minded as were the poets of the early nineteenth century.

Synge, H. A. Jones, Sir Arthur Pinero, Yeats, Galsworthy, all knew the gift of laughter, and could turn from themes predominatingly tragic to the realm of comedy. This in itself marks a great advance in drama. Socrates, or Plato, was unquestionably right in finding the sources of tragedy and of comedy nearly allied, and in declaring that the great poet of the one type must necessarily have in him the qualities essential for success in the other. Indeed, there might be added to the reasons of dramatic decline in the early nineteenth century the fact that the poets knew not how to laugh. The predominating feature of Wordsworth, Coleridge, Keats, Shelley, and Tennyson is their consistent seriousness. They took themselves and all the world seriously, and smiled gravely if they smiled at all. If Wordsworth tries for a moment to be sportive he becomes ridiculously commonplace ; if Shelley tries to write a humorous piece, such as Œdipus Tyrannus, he becomes inexpressibly coarse. Only the lesser men of the time, such as Lamb and Hood, knew what it was to see the folly of life and the eternal discrepancy between ideal and realization.

BRITISH DRAMA

Toward the end of the nineteenth century we discern this coarseness and almost indecent sportiveness giving way to a healthier tone. T. W. Robertson heralds its coming, just as he heralds the arrival of the problem play, and it rises to a culmination in the work of W. S. Gilbert and of Oscar Wilde. The one adopted as the favourite medium for the expression of his ideas the comic opera, the other occupied the realm of regular comedy, but both are definitely intellectual, satirical, and witty. Both belong to the tradition of the comedy of manners, revived by Sheridan, and largely forgotten in an age of romantic enthusiasm and impossible ideality.

The work of Gilbert and its importance has been already indicated. In some respects Gilbert with his operatic extravaganzas lies apart from the regular development of comic drama, and it may for a moment seem strange to connect with him the author of Salome, the leader of the 'Art for art's sake' cult, and the chief butt for Gilbert's satire in Patience. Wilde, however, does occupy this peculiar position, a position not unlike that assumed by Abraham Cowley in the seventeenth century. Just as Cowley, in an age of outworn romanticism, proved himself at one and the same time the leader of the metaphysical school in its last stages of decay and the inaugurator of the new age of reason and of heroic couplets, so Wilde in his poetry represents all that is worst in decadent romanticism, and in his comedies all that is vital in the rising comedy of manners. His serious works for the theatre are of little value, the silly Vera, or, The Nihilists (1883), the decadent Duchess of Padua (1891), and the notorious Salome (1892); it is his comedies that must claim the attention of any historian of the theatre. These comedies started with Lady Windermere's Fan (1892), continued with A Woman of No Importance (1893) and An Ideal Husband (1895), and finished with The Importance of being Earnest (1895). These plays, it is true, are not by any means purely intellectual. Several of them, in particular the first two, are filled with sentimentalism of the worst type and introduce problems of social life. In Lady Windermere's Fan we find that

THE REVIVAL OF COMEDY

Lord Windermere has married a high-spirited and proud girl, who is, although she is unaware of the fact, the daughter of Mrs Erlynne, a woman of sullied life but humane feeling. Mrs Erlynne, who has been blackmailing the unfortunate lord, demands to be invited to a party at his house, but his wife, who has heard gossip about the two, flares into a passion. She declares that she will strike Mrs Erlynne with her fan should she make her appearance at the party. Her courage, or her better feelings, prevents her from creating a public scandal, but her pride will not suffer her to live longer with her husband. She writes him a note and slips off to the bachelor rooms of a man who had professed himself her lover. Mrs Erlynne finds the letter, and, guessing the truth, opens it. Her horror is increased when she realizes that this is her own story over again. Frantic with fear she hurries off, and discovers her daughter alone in the room of her lover. Vainly for a time she argues with her ; but at last she arouses the spirit of Lady Windermere and gets her away. She herself steps behind a curtain. A party of gay aristocrats enters the room. One of these spies the fan, and they are proceeding to jest on Lady Windermere's attachment for their friend, when Mrs Erlynne, conquering her own pride, steps forward and claims the fan as her own. It is the sacrifice which she can make for her daughter's honour. So, too, in A Woman of No Importance the theme is one eminently pathetic and sentimental, the unfortunate Mrs Arbuthnot claiming our full sympathy. An Ideal Husband is little less of a problem drama flavoured with sentimental motives.

All of these serious themes, however, Wilde has clothed with a profusion of wit, and one has the impression that in none of them did he believe very much. His paradoxes follow one another in swift volleys. He attempts to charm as Congreve did in 1700. The peculiar thing is that somehow he made the two elements unite together. Sentimentalism killed the comedy of manners in the early eighteenth century, but it does not destroy Wilde's similar gaiety. It may be that nowadays we have grown a trifle tired of the paradoxes and verbal sallies which are associated with the names of Wilde and of Whistler, the excessive brilliance of scintillating if not intellectually profound minds, but for all that Wilde's plays will remain stock pieces in our theatres. There is something permanent in them, and they can never be relegated to oblivion. The Importance of being Earnest is a delightfully fantastic paradox of a plot, enlivened by brilliant dialogue, and even the more serious dramas possess a decided originality in treatment and in theme. Artificial they may be, but artificiality has always been a distinguishing mark of the comedy of manners.

With Wilde come many other authors, some of them the masters of the serious problem play. Thus H. A. Jones will be remembered not only for his Saints and Sinners, but also for The Liars (1897). There is truly in The Liars a type of laughter which has been heard in the English theatre but rarely since the times of Goldsmith and Sheridan: not the loud outburst of merriment such as greets the farce or the ludicrous music-hall turn, but the mellowed laughter which results from sheer intellectual enjoyment. The Liars, too, besides having this essence of genuine comic wit, possesses a well-developed although peculiarly constructed plot, which preserves its clarity even in the midst of the complications consequent on the introduction of character after character as the play develops. Of the unsatirical comedy of manners in his time H. A. Jones proved himself a skilful master.

More satirical is Alfred Sutro, who has striven to give a tone of purpose to this comedy of social life. His failing probably arises from that endeavour. Frequently there is a discrepancy between the achievement and the aim. Sutro's first play, A Marriage has been Arranged, was acted in 1902, and during the thirty-odd years of his dramatic career he has written some twenty-two plays. Among his literary and popular triumphs must be numbered The Walls of Jericho (1904), The Fascinating Mr Vanderheldt (1906), and The Choice (1919). Sutro's work is marked chiefly by his essentially natural dialogue. Without utilizing colloquialism and dialect he has succeeded in giving a lifelike effect to a dialogue which is truly brilliant. His characters, on the other hand, do not quite harmonize with this conversation; frequently he descends, as in the Angela and Oliver of The Fascinating Mr Vanderveldt, to stock figures. His fundamental attitude to life, too, lacks firmness. In The Perplexed Husband (1911), for example, his treatment of the 'woman question' has not got beyond the stage of Sir Arthur Pinero's The Weaker Sex, written over twenty years earlier; one feels that he has not thoroughly grasped the society with which he is dealing and that in most of his characters, such as Kalleia and Dulcie Elstead, he is dealing with figures mechanically conceived to suit the purposes of his plot.

THE REVIVAL OF COMEDY

In this Sutro forms a marked contrast to Hubert Henry Davies, who died in 1917. Davies's work dealt more with the fanciful and the psychological than with the depiction of manners and of wit. Mrs Gorrings's Necklace (1903), Cousin Kate (1903), and The Mollusc (1907) are all marked by these qualities. For subtle portraiture Davies was almost unrivalled in his time, The Mollusc in particular presenting a delicate study of a woman character, and his talent for infusing a romantic atmosphere into a realistic plot, without thereby descending into the morass of sentimentalism, was truly remarkable. This comedy is of particular interest because of its retention of the unity of place, although tendencies toward this retention can be traced in other modern dramatists alongside of contrary movements. In the modern drama we may have on the one hand the rapidly changing scene and the duration of generations in Back to Methuselah, while on the other we are confronted with the unity of place in The Mollusc or the double unities in Mr Shaw's Getting Married.

In spite of the tendency toward wit and satire, to be seen clearly enough later in the dramatic work of Mr A. A. Milne and in that of Mr C. K. Munro, the latter of whom has won success with At Mrs Beam's (1921) and with Storm, or the Battle of Tinderly Down (1924), there is a decided movement toward fantasy in treatment and in theme as we move onward from the year 1910. It appears in the artificiality and exaggeration of At Mrs Beam's no less than in H. V. Esmond's Eliza comes to Stay (1912) and in Arnold Bennett's The Great Adventure (1911). In the last-mentioned comedy a famous artist, Ilam Carve, allows himself to be thought dead. His valet, Albert Shawn, is buried with full honours in Westminster Abbey, and the artist settles down to a quiet Putney existence with Janet Cannot. The Bond-street picture-expert Ebag penetrates his disguise, and Westminster Abbey is trembling on the verge of a national disgrace. Relief comes through Lord Leonard Alcar, who patches up the differences between Carve and his cousin, and those between Ebag and the American collector Texel. The whole plot is delightfully impossible. We know, and Bennett knew, that this could never have happened, yet the treatment is realistically satiric, somewhat in the Shavian style. An element of farce, it has been said, must enter into every true comedy, and farce in our own times is taking the form of topsyturvy fancy.

BRITISH DRAMA

This fantasy, allied with realism, appears often in the work of George Calderon, whose The Fountain (1909) deserves remembrance, and in that of Harold Chapin, author of Augustus in Search of a Father (1910), The Marriage of Columbine (1910), and The Philosopher of Butterbiggins (1915). Chapin's style is lighter than those we have been considering, but is marked by a delicate touch and true sympathy. Allan Monkhouse adopts the same style in Mary Broome (1911), The Education of Mr Surrage (1912), and his one-act piece, The Grand Cham's Diamond (1918). The last-mentioned playlet, employing to excellent effect the surroundings and dialect of a lower middle-class London suburb, throws into the midst of an ordinary setting a wave of romance, which takes shape as a great diamond stolen from the "Grand Cham." Mrs Perkins would keep it when it comes flying through their window, for in her commonplace breast she nourishes a craving for something beyond their narrow surroundings, but it is taken back by her daughter's fiancé Albert, who is a detective. Quietly they all settle down again, and the bird of romance is flown.

THE REVIVAL OF COMEDY

Miss Perkins. I don't know what Albert'll think of you.

Mrs Perkins. 'E's not going to marry me, thank 'eaven.

Mr Perkins. D'y' want t' know what I think of yer ?

Mrs Perkins. Go on ! Y've no 'magernation.

Miss Perkins. I never thought to be ashamed of my own mother.

Mr Perkins. Wantin' in the very el'ments of morality. I wonder 'ow Sossiety'd get on if they was all like you.

Mrs Perkins. Polly, put up that blind. It's a bit chilly with them broken panes.

Miss Perkins. Most unladylike as well.

[They settle down into their chairs again. Mrs Perkins takes up her darning and Mr Perkins the paper. After putting up the blind Miss Perkins returns to her puzzle.]

Mrs Perkins. 'Ow much did y' say it was worth, Pa ?

Mr Perkins [gruffly]. Never mind.

Mrs Perkins. Well, I 'ad my bit o' fun for onct.

CURTAIN

Here is no struggle of generations, youth against age ; it is age itself which pines for romance.

John Galsworthy in Joy (1907), a play in which a daughter cannot realize her mother's love-affairs until she falls in love herself, and in The Little Man (1915) captures something of the same style. The Little Man is "a farcical morality." The characters are individually portrayed, and there is realism to the extent of an Austrian railway buffet, a Continental train, and German Polizei, but the whole atmosphere is one of fancy and impossibility. So, too, with the work of Rudolf Besier. Don (1909) and Lady Patricia (1911) are delightful admixtures of these two qualities. Virtuosity and topsy-turvy idealism are Rudolf Besier's chief fields, and few have succeeded in painting them so perfectly and with such subtle grace. Granville-Barker's charming Prunella (1904; written in collaboration with Mr Laurence Housman) captures the same atmosphere in its delightful lines and quaint setting.

In the same style are written Louis Napoleon Parker's Disraeli (1911), Pomander Walk (1912), and The Minuet (1922), where an effort is made to secure, without an undue infusion of sentimentality, a similar impression of delicacy and of quaintness. Perhaps Mr Graham Moffat's Bunt pulls the Strings (1911) and A Scrape o' the Pen (1912) may be mentioned alongside of these, and with them Mr Harold Brighouse's Lonesome-like (1911), Spring in Bloomsbury (1911), and Followers (1915), as well as Mr Eden Phillpotts' successfully revived The Farmer's Wife (1916).

Wit, satire, display of social manners, therefore, all run parallel with another movement, which deals with fancy and things impossible. Mr George Bernard Shaw and Sir James Barrie stand at the head of these two movements, even if at times the two strains seem confused and for a moment Mr Shaw becomes Sir James Barrie and Sir James Barrie becomes Mr Shaw. It is probable that the comedy of the future will be distinguished mainly by this comparatively modern development of fantastic realism, where dialect and living characters keep us tied to the ordinary world and where imagination bears us to enchanted realms, to "things impossible and cast beyond the moon."

(ii) J. M. SYNGE AND THE IRISH SCHOOL

In this rapid survey of the comic endeavour during the period nothing has so far been said of the Irish comic theatre. Though the majority of the works produced at the Abbey Theatre, Dublin, have been tragic or gloomy there have been sufficient comedies written for that theatre during the last thirty years to merit their independent treatment. Synge himself, who found tragic expression for his thoughts in Riders to the Sea and in Deirdre of the Sorrows, cast his In the Shadow of the Glen as a comedy and wrote his greatest masterpiece, The Playboy of the Western World (1907), in a laughing strain. The plot, perhaps, savours of impossibility, but for all that The Playboy is a realistic work, so realistic that it aroused a wild storm of indignation from the patriotic camp when it first appeared. The plot is a simple one, but delightfully absurd. At a small Irish village there arrives a callow youth, one Christy Mahon, who is thought to have killed his father. Away from the reality, all who hear his grandiloquent tale magnify him into a hero, and Pegeen Flaherty goes so far as to cast off her loutish fiancé, Shawn, in favour of this grand and picturesque figure. Christy's joy, however, is soon cut short by the arrival of his father, who chastises him soundly and leaves the inn. Pegeen finds her hero to be a man of very mortal clay, and her taunting words express her own disappointment and bitterness of heart. Her tirade fires Christy with a real glow of courage; he rushes outside and murderously attacks his father. The latter is left lying for dead, but the reality does not impress the village folk as did the reported deed, clothed in the soft light of distance. Instead of praising and admiring the unfortunate Christy, they seize and bind him, with intent to give him over to justice. But old Mahon is a sturdy peasant, and even his son's fury has not succeeded in knocking the life out of him. In he comes again, and there ensues an uproarious scene in the course of which the father takes the side of his son, and off they trudge in fair good humour from Flaherty's house. Shawn now thinks that Pegeen will return to him, but her mind has been filled with a vision. She has lost the only Playboy of the Western World, and Shawn is dismissed with a good sound cuff on the ear to pay him for his lack of spirit and for his impertinence.

THE REVIVAL OF COMEDY

The Playboy of the Western World is, unquestionably, the chief masterpiece in comedy with which the Irish theatre has so far provided us, but there are many other plays which come near to catching its broad humour and free sense of fun. Mr Lennox Robinson has produced two charming works of this kind, The Whiteheaded Boy (1916) and The Far-off Hills (1931); even Yeats, mystic and poet though he be, has written an excellent satiric comedy in The Pot of Broth (1902) and has infused into many of his more serious plays scenes of a humorous nature. The chief exponent of comedy in the Irish school is Lady I. A. Gregory. A few tragic pieces she wrote, but her main tendencies were toward the comic, and her knowledge of Irish life and character enabled her to write a series of delightfully entertaining and amusing plays. Like so many of the English dramatists she delighted in the interweaving of fantasy and real life. Her dramatis personæ are drawn from actuality, but her plots frequently turn on some impossible and imaginative theme. So, too, she loved exaggeration, and employed that exaggeration with perfect surety to secure her effects. Her great strength, however, came from her contact with the folk. Just as Synge found inspiration in the maybe coarse but primitively strong and untouched qualities of the Irish peasantry, writing almost in a mediævally blunt strain The Tinker's Wedding (1909), so Lady Gregory has gone to the people for her chief power. Spreading the News (1904), Hyacinth Halvey (1906), The Jackdaw (1907), and other of her plays depend entirely for their value on this close contact with the folk, and in thus showing how much of worth lies in the primitive emotions of a comparatively uncivilized community she and Synge have given an inestimable gift to our literature. Under Wilde and Sir Arthur Pinero the drama was rapidly becoming vitiated, because wholly intent upon an over-cultured and often morally degenerate society. The Irish writers, no less than the Russian writers, have displayed to us what artistic and morally healthy elements may be gained by a study of less sophisticated circles.

In one particular direction, too, Lady Gregory stands forward as an innovator. In his Pompey the Great (1910) Mr Masefield endeavoured to reinterpret the salient facts of a great historical epoch in the light of modern times. Somewhat satirically Mr Shaw has done the same in The Man of Destiny (1897) and in Cæsar and Cleopatra (1899). Lady Gregory, writing of historical events in The Canavans (1906) and in The White Cockade (1905), has striven to show what excellent comedy can be achieved, without any satirical purpose, by a similar treatment of ancient times. To this type of drama, Lady Gregory herself has given the title "Folk-history," and she has written enough to show that there are here infinite possibilities for modern dramatists who would return to the inspiration of the people. Virtually, we are back once more in that epoch which gave birth to the author of George a Greene and to those many writers of chronicle-history plays of whom Shakespeare is immeasurably the greatest.

GEORGE BERNARD SHAW

Whether the Irish drama of the years to come will continue this comic strain is uncertain. The most recent experiments in play-writing seem to indicate that a kind of seriousness is creeping over the Dublin stage, and that the humorous quality so freely expressed in the past is beginning to fade away. The time, however, has not come for any definite prognostications, and maybe the happier note will return to echo the strains of Synge, of Lady Gregory, and of Mr Lennox Robinson.

(iii) GEORGE BERNARD SHAW

Apart from all the others stands Mr George Bernard Shaw. He was, in the eighteen-nineties, one of those who called back the drama to the ways of realism, yet throughout the whole of his career he displayed a strange love of the fantastic and the absurd ; he was father of the theatre of ideas in England, seriously preaching his sermons on social follies and social vices, yet no one gave more to the drama of his time in the way of wit, fun, and humour. Paradoxically, too, he is master of the old generation and the new ; it may be that he had to struggle to make himself heard in the playhouse, it may be that to-day some of the younger school react against his work ; but the fact remains—Mr Shaw was the outstanding figure in the theatre from 1890 to 1920, and he is the outstanding figure in the theatre of to-day. In the series of plays from Widowers' Houses in 1892 to Too True to be Good in 1932 there may be many weak, trivial, and foolish pieces, yet no man in our time has sustained such a freshness and vitality as he. Even when over seventy he could startle the conventionalists and experiment in new dramatic forms.

So far as the content of his plays is concerned, the key-notes to Mr Shaw's work are rationalism and what may be styled critical rebellion. In the plays produced before 1920 he attacks things as they are because, by the application of reason, he sees them as vicious, useless, or foolish. Whatever, then, is sentimental and romantic he has despised as false. Whatever is contrary to the dictates of reason he has opposed. Whatever is set up as a fetish by the unthinking mass he has ruthlessly destroyed. His socialism is not of the emotional kind. He is not inspired with a great pity for 'the under-dog' as Galsworthy is. Rather does he look round him, and witnessing the many follies in our management of life he strives to remedy the abuses, not by serious problem plays, but by turning topsy-turvy our social state. Sir James Barrie delights in revealing the other side of the picture, not for any social purpose, but simply because it amuses him. Mr Shaw loves to show that other side in order that he may point a moral. Complacency and romantic artificiality are the things he detests. He objects to the typical assumptions of the sentimental dramatists just as much as he objects to the typical assumptions of the sentimentalists in real life. Everything, therefore, comes within the sphere of his caustic pen—literature, art, medicine, religion, politics, racial prejudice, social standards. He is the great destroyer of evil in our modern age, and out of his destructiveness he seeks to lead us toward a newer, fresher, and more constructive thought.

The weapon which Mr Shaw uses with greatest precision is the weapon of satire. He is ruthless and he cuts deep. There is for him no question of compromise or of sparing. Like many satirists Mr Shaw has moved from a more or less normal world to a world of fantasy. He starts with The Philanderer (acted 1898; printed 1905) and Candida (1895), and moves through Androcles and the Lion (1913) and The Inca of Perusalem (1917) or Annajanska, the Bolshevik Empress (1918), to Back to Methuselah. In analysing this satirical strain and its gradual development, it is almost impossible for us, in Mr Shaw's own presence and in such close proximity to those things against which he tilts, to formulate any exhaustive or final summary of his position in the history of drama and of thought. Many men have said profound or witty things about Mr Shaw, but time only can place him in that particular position in the development of the theatre which it is his to fill. All that may be done here is to glance at one or two of his chief plays in the hope that we may find some common qualities to aid us in the estimate of his work.

Widowers' Houses, Mrs Warren's Profession (1898; printed 1902), and one or two others of his works belong almost solely to the sphere of the problem play. In the first he attacks that chief evil in our cities, the slum-tenement, but the play is not merely a one-sided assault at a national disgrace. Mr Shaw looks deeper than most. He sees the enormous complexity of our modern civilization. It is no longer, as the romanticists thought, a story of evil landlords and oppressed poverty. Such a statement of the case, to Mr Shaw, seems not only inadequate but ridiculous, not only false but positively mischief-making. If we are to think of reforming the slums we must strike deeper than the landlord; we must go to the roots of society itself. Accordingly, he takes as his hero one Trench, who objects to the dowry of his fiancée, Blanche Sartorius, because it has come from the rents torn out of the hands of the poor. Trench is an idealist, but he has to face cold reality when he finds that his own money is largely tainted by the same evils against which he battled. Gradually he is drawn into the net, and at the close of the play he is plotting with Sartorius and his rent-collector to secure more money on his property. The same pitiless exposure of real facts is poured into Mrs Warren's Profession, a drama which takes as its theme the question of prostitution. Dragging away one by one the veils which have been cast over this subject by idealistic romanticists and by men of the world alike, Mr Shaw tries to regard it in the light of reason, and finds the only solution in banishing emotion and sentimentalism, in cutting out of life all the romantic glow which so often clothes foul brutality, in establishing a new age of intellect and of logical thought. So he passes from one theme to another. In Arms and the Man (1894) it is war and romantic soldiering he would tilt against. Even then he could see that war was no longer a thing of banners and glory, such a thing as Tamburlaine and Othello and Sir Walter Scott saw it, but a dull, sordid affair of brute strength and callous planning out.

BRITISH DRAMA

The Bulgarian Sergius is the representative of an outworn convention, and Captain Bluntschli, the Swiss matter-of-fact warrior, is the symbol of present-day conditions. Candida carries us back to domestic problems. A good-looking, but somewhat elderly, woman is adored by a foolishly poetic youth. Her husband, a philanthropic and energetic clergyman, is thrown into despair, for he thinks that poetry may win the day. But Candida gives herself to him who is weakest, and the weakest is her husband.

Thus does Mr Shaw pass through the whole gallery of stock portraits—portraits of warriors, of philanthropists, of poets, of tyrants, of rent-collectors—and, turning the canvases on the wall, he shows that some impish artist has painted a reverse on every one, and the reverse is nearer to life than the long-treasured and long-admired obverse. Coming to history, he takes Napoleon and the great Queen of Egypt, the glorious lover who will give her whole life for passion, and he shows them both as ordinary man and woman. Napoleon in The Man of Destiny (1897) is nothing more than a successful captain, easily attracted by a pair of bold eyes; Cleopatra in Cæsar and Cleopatra (1899) is no more than a little madcap of a girl, tyrannized over by an old nurse, and the conqueror of the world has only cunning and sagacity to bear him through many trials. Perhaps Mr Shaw has taken a hint here from Shakespeare's earlier satire in Troilus and Cressida. And then there is the convention of man's strength and of woman's weakness, the eternal courtship and wooing, the man's question and the woman's bashful answer. "Is this really so?" is Mr Shaw's query, and in Man and Superman (1903) he strives to show it is not. With exquisite fancy he takes Don Juan as his hero, and attempts to display the other (and real) portrait of that voluptuary and ruiner of women. The main part of the story tells how Ann, driven by the life force, tricks Jack Tanner, the revolutionary and free-thinker, into marriage. Tanner knows perfectly well what she is about, although the poetic Octavius would still regard woman as an angel sent from on high. Poor little "Ricky-ticky-tavy" gets the worst of it, or, as Tanner would have said, the best of it. Ann, although she may play with him as a cat plays with a mouse, wants Tanner himself, and even a modern automobile with the good services of the Cockney chauffeur, Enry Straker, cannot save him. Tanner and Octavius are set in close opposition. The one is the clear-eyed modernist, the other the romantic poet :

Octavius. I cannot write without inspiration. And nobody can give me that except Ann.

Tanner. Well, hadnt you better get it from her at a safe distance ? Petrarch didnt see half as much of Laura, nor Dante of Beatrice, as you see of Ann now ; and yet they wrote first-rate poetry—at least so Im told. They never exposed their idolatry to the test of domestic familiarity ; and it lasted them to their graves. Marry Ann ; and at the end of a week youll find no more inspiration in her than in a plate of muffins.

Octavius. You think I shall tire of her !

Tanner. Not at all : you dont get tired of muffins. But you dont find inspiration in them ; and you wont in her when she ceases to be a poet's dream and becomes a solid eleven-stone wife. Youll be forced to dream about somebody else ; and then there will be a row.

Octavius. This sort of talk is no use, Jack. You dont understand. You have never been in love.

Tanner. I ! I have never been out of it. Why, I am in love even with Ann. But I am neither the slave of love or its dupe. Go to the bee, thou poet : consider her ways and be wise. By Heaven, Tavy, if women could do without our work, and we ate their children's bread instead of making it, they would kill us as the spider kills her mate or as the bees kill the drone. And they would be right if we were good for nothing but love.

In the end Tanner is captured. Ann marries him even as he protests solemnly that he is not a happy man. The realism of this play is cleverly interwoven with some purely fantastic elements. Tanner and Straker are captured by some brigands as they motor over the mountains, and in the evening, as we listen to Mendoza's nonsensical rimes :

O wert thou, Louisa,
The wife of Mendoza,
Mendoza's Louisa, Louisa Mendoza,
How blest were the life of Louisa's Mendoza !
How painless his longing of love for Louisa !

BRITISH DRAMA

we fall asleep, and dream of a place where there is "no sky, no peaks, no light, no sound, no time nor space, utter void." We are in hell, conversing with Don Juan (who is startlingly like Jack Tanner), the statue which caused his death, and the devil. Don Juan is the embodiment of the intellectual philosophy of life. Reason for him is predominant :

That is why intellect is so unpopular. But to Life, the force behind the Man, intellect is a necessity, because without it he blunders into death. Just as Life, after ages of struggle, evolved that wonderful bodily organ the eye, so that the living organism could see where it was going and what was coming to help or threaten it, and thus avoid a thousand dangers that formerly slew it, so it is evolving to-day a mind's eye that shall see, not the physical world, but the purpose of Life, and thereby enable the individual to work for that purpose instead of thwarting and baffling it by setting up shortsighted personal aims as at present. Even as it is, only one sort of man has ever been happy, has ever been universally respected among all the conflicts of interests and illusions . . . the philosophic man : he who seeks in contemplation to discover the inner will of the world, in invention to discover the means of fulfilling that will, and in action to do that will by the so-discovered means.

The philosophic man is Mr Shaw's ideal ; he has later shown us his own constructive view of life in Back to Methuselah.

It is impossible here to do more than mention some of the innumerable facets of existence which Mr Shaw has illuminated with his satire and his vision. In The Devil's Disciple (1897) and The Shewing-up of Blanco Posnet (1909) he has taken religion for his theme, varying his treatment of that theme in Major Barbara (1905). The Devil's Disciple is a delicious satire at once of romantic melodrama and of puritanical faith hardened into mere convention. The devil's disciple, for all his irreligious and blasphemous utterances, is the only one among the crowd of canting sinners who has a glimpse of diviner fire in him. Even the minister-husband is more of a soldier than a servant of peace. This play is especially noteworthy for the interesting portrait it contains of General Burgoyne, soldier, playwright, and wit of the late eighteenth century. In

SCENE IN ADDISON'S "CATO"

A WATER MELODRAMA AT SADLER'S WELLS

John Bull's Other Island (1904) Mr Shaw turns good-humouredly to banter both English and Irish prejudices. He can see the follies of both, and again he casts the pure light of reason upon a problem complicated by English insularity and Irish passion and idealism. The Doctor's Dilemma (1906) casts the same cold searchlight upon the medical profession. "Strip off all sentimentality," the author again cries; "judge things as they are, not as they might or ought to be; only so can you achieve salvation." Getting Married (1908) throws equal ridicule, instinct with sense and reason, upon the discrepancies of our marriage system, and The Dark Lady of the Sonnets (1910), trivial as it is, is full of shrewd wit and comment on a problem made hazy and bewildering by a mass of romantic critics. Androcles and the Lion (1913) searchingly casts light on early religious faith and religious experience; Pygmalion (1913) is a brilliant study of contemporary social conventions.

In all this intellectual treatment of literature, of history, and of social life the prime thing we note is the penetrating vision of the writer. There is no stopping for him half-way; he is brave enough to carry his sight as far as it will reach. The unknown terrors bring no fear to him; he is calm and restrained in the consciousness of his own intellectual eminence. It is not too much to say that intellectually he bestrides our modern thought like a colossus. Filled with a deep horror of misery, imbued with a sense of the unhealthiness and abject poverty, mental and physical, of the slums, he does not find solace in a weak humanitarianism or an equally weak sentimental philanthropy. He pierces down below the surface and sees that a Trench and a Major Barbara are of no avail, and that even these must bow to take sustenance from the things they despise. The great constructive element in his work is not his philosophy of age, as expressed in Back to Methuselah, but this inimitable power of searching to the very roots of things for the causes of decay and disintegration. Whereas others would be content to nip off a withered bud or to give a spray of disinfectant, Mr Shaw desires to transplant and give a change of soil.

BRITISH DRAMA

From the literary point of view Mr Shaw's drama means a great deal to the English theatre. Not only has he taught a new incisiveness of utterance, and given what is virtually a new dramatic dialogue, but he has also provided a fresh principle of characterization. The characters in the romantic plays were not so much stereotyped as framed on a false pattern. Mr Shaw has shown men how to draw characters arrestingly and freshly dramatic. Instead of timid heroines, we find intellectually daring women; instead of strong heroes, men lacking power and self-will; instead of fantastically model clergymen, ministers who feel more at ease in buff-coat and jack-boots; instead of impossible villains, men who are themselves the tools of society. Even beyond this the debt of the modern drama to him is great. He showed new methods of fusing fantasy and reality; he was constantly experimenting in fresh dramatic devices. Above all, he made the drama, more than ever it had been before, literature. Without taking away from the theatrical quality of his work, he added to stage direction and to preface such additional matter that even in the study his works take shape before us. Seeing the rivalry of the novel, he has dared to step into the enemy's camp and take from him some of his most jealously guarded devices. It is not only that Mr Shaw gives us more details than are commonly given concerning the settings of his plays; he goes into the past history of his characters. Thus, at the opening of Man and Superman, we are treated to a full-length picture of Roebuck Ramsden seated in his study. Chairs and tables, neckties and waistcoats, are described to us, and then :

He has not been out of doors yet to-day! so he still wears his slippers, his boots being ready for him on the hearthrug. Surmising that he has no valet, and seeing that he has no secretary with shorthand notebook and a typewriter, one meditates on how little our great burgess domesticity has been disturbed by new fashions and methods, or by the enterprise of the railway and hotel companies which sell you a Saturday to Monday of life at Folkestone as a real gentleman for two guineas, first class fares both ways included.

How old is Roebuck? The question is important on the threshold of a drama of ideas; for under such circumstances everything depends on whether his adolescence belonged to the sixties or to the eighties. He was born, as a matter of fact, in 1839, and was a Unitarian and Free Trader from his boyhood, and an Evolutionist from the publication of the Origin of Species. Consequently he has always classed himself as an advanced thinker and fearlessly outspoken reformer.

GEORGE BERNARD SHAW

It is unquestionable that this device has added to the popularity of drama. After a few years of hesitancy in the publishing of plays,¹ the newer writers sought for a double public. Without ignoring the theatre, as the poets of the past had done, they made an appeal also to the many readers of novels and of poetry. Their stage directions and their prefaces alike were penned for this purpose, and as a consequence the drama as a whole became ever more and more a part of literature. In thus re-establishing the literary drama the modern writers were striking out and away from the trivial and vain romantic theatre of the preceding decades, and their work owes a tremendous debt to the activity and boldness of Mr Shaw, whose Plays Pleasant and Unpleasant (1898) and Plays for Puritans (1900) fully established the drama alongside of the novel as a popular literary form.

In thus noting what has become a general modern tendency, we must observe certain disadvantages attendant upon it. While Mr Shaw's stage directions are not meant to serve quite the same purpose as those in Hardy's The Dynasts, which was "intended simply for mental performance and not for the stage," it is inevitable that they should tend toward a loss of power in the dialogue of the play. When a dramatist finds he can express his thoughts through the preface and through the stage directions he may very possibly be led into avoiding the more subtle and more difficult method of revealing them through the words of his characters, and he may be drawn still farther to the introduction of scenes unfitted for the theatre. Sir James Barrie perhaps shows a still completer development of this tendency. Not content with elaborating the stage direction, he couches his whole drama in the form of a narrative, banishing altogether the stage directions of Mr Shaw's fancy and putting the language of his characters into inverted commas as though he were penning a novel. The result is to be seen in The Old Lady shows her Medals (1917), in which we get a final scene entirely unsuited for stage performance. The play once more is being led away from the theatre. Granville-Barker too succumbed to this only too fatally easy device. In The Madras House he introduces one of his characters thus:

¹ Owing to the fact that there was no copyright convention with the United States of America, many dramatists in the eighties refused to publish their works. The agreement of 1891 removed all difficulties.

Philip's wife is an epitome of all that æsthetic culture can do for a woman. More : she is the result—not of thirty-three years—but of three or four generations of refinement. She might be a race-horse ! Come to think of it, it is a very wonderful thing to have raised this crop of ladyhood. Creatures, lainty in mind and body, gentle in thought and word, charming, delicate, sensitive, chaste, credulous of all good, shaming the world's ugliness and strife by the very ease and delightsomeness of their existence ; fastidious—fastidious—fastidious ! also in these latter years with their attractions more generally salted by the addition of learning and humour. Is not the perfect lady perhaps the most wonderful achievement of civilization, and worth the cost of her breeding, worth the toil and the helotage of all the others ?

One thing a study of such Shavian stage-directions teaches us—that Mr Shaw is a consummate dramatic artist. Clearly a technical device of this kind is apt to make the play un-theatrical in that the author, failing to express his meaning through the words of his characters, is inclined to fall back upon this easier, because more direct, method of explaining his purposes.¹ It has been said by many that Mr Shaw was not a born dramatist, that he had merely seized on the theatre because it gave him a platform from which to preach his sermons, that his plays are little more than illustrations of his prefaces. This view, it is almost certain, must be rejected by future historians of the drama. No writer of our time has shown such a vivid and appreciative sense of the theatre as Mr Shaw, and it is because of the theatrical qualities in his work that his plays will survive. His philosophy may be smiled at a century hence, and his 'problems' may seem then problems no more, but his dramas—at least half a dozen of them—must retain their appeal because of the way in which he has made use of effects which are theatrically striking and because of the incisive beauty of his dialogue. Essentially Mr Shaw is a playwright, not a philosopher.

¹ It is interesting to note that the technique of the wireless play is operating healthily against the potential evils of this modern device. Reginald Berkeley's The Quest of Elizabeth (1926) thus opens with the stage-direction, "The scene, time and characters become apparent as the play proceeds."

GEORGE BERNARD SHAW

PART VIII

THE MODERN DRAMA (1920-46)

CHAPTER I

THE FORCES OF REVOLT

BY the year 1920 the forces of realism had spent themselves. It had been necessary that the powerfully buttressed citadel of artificiality which had been the stronghold of the nineteenth-century theatre should be overthrown, and such an overthrowing could come only by the substitution of something definitely concrete. The realist found his standards in the life around him ; that life gave him something by reference to which his efforts and the efforts of his companions might be judged. Because men were tired of the old artificiality, and because they desired a form of art deeper rooted in human values, realism flourished for fully three decades.

At the end of that time, however, there came the need of change. Even within the period of realism itself—even among the great masters of the realist style—the need for something more had already made itself apparent. Ibsen's later plays, as we have noted, are suffused with a peculiar symbolism which raises them above ordinary realist conventions. Strindberg, author of The Father (1887), turned in 1907 to write The Spook Sonata. The work of Stanislavski in the Moscow Art Theatre led directly toward the development of extra-realist tendencies in the studio of Vachtangov. The work of Mr Gordon Craig set a new standard and indicated a new ideal. In France M. Maeterlinck, with Pelléas et Mélisande (1892) and L'oiseau bleu (1908), had placed himself in opposition to the then prevailing mood. In Ireland poetic tendencies produced the masterpieces of Synge, the romantically inclined verse dramas of Yeats. And in England, besides the fantastic drama of Sir James Barrie, the symbolic forms assumed by Lord Dunsany's plays, the imaginative treatment of Mr Gilbert Cannan's dramas, and the more traditional verse tragedies of Stephen Phillips, Mr Bernard Shaw had shown, from his earliest days in the theatre, a dissatisfaction with realism alone. Such anti-realist tendencies, on the other hand, had been distinctly subordinate to the prevailing movement toward naturalism. They displayed the inherent weakness of the naturalistic style, and they served to aid those who later sought for an escape from realism ; but from this work the theatre of 1890-1920 does not take its tone.

THE FORCES OF REVOLT

To seize on any particular year as marking a change is, of course, to adopt somewhat artificial standards, but the year 1920 does seem to form a kind of dividing line between the new and the old. The clearest expression of the movements of revolt (or of reaction) was to be seen in Germany before the advent of Naziism. Fundamentally, it may be said that men became dissatisfied with the somewhat gloomy and exalted treatment of life such as the realists had shown. The realists, in general, either had chosen to depict life with a kind of despairing acceptance of its miseries and its littleness or had indulged in revolt against merely social conventions. Thus, the 'generations' theme, which we have seen expressed in various English plays, inspired Hasenclever to write Der Sohn (1914), and the 'general revolt' theme produced Sorge's Der Bettler (1912), Toller's Die Wandlung (1919), and Wildgans' Dies Irae (1919). This revolt, however, was mainly negative and destructive ; it seldom escaped from a somewhat pessimistic and despairing spirit of hopelessness. Meanwhile, in life around men felt themselves being more and more dragged down by the machine-world which they had themselves called into being. Materialism had triumphed. In many minds now sprang the desire to achieve something positive, to affirm the existence of something more important than the merely material, to testify to the worth of spiritual values. Some of such men found a way through Impressionism. To define literary or artistic terms of this kind is a hard task, but it may be said that the impressionist is one who endeavours, partly by stepping aside from reality, to establish an individual work of personal impressions. One kind of impressionism will differ from another, but in all there is the emphasis on the subjective reception of impressions of this kind, and in all there is an attempt to escape from the more terrible and tyrannous aspects of objective reality. The impressionist may be a reviver of romantic terms such as Rostand, or a dreamer such as Maeterlinck, or an exploiter of the occult such as Yeats ; rarely, if ever, will he accept material life as it exists. Quite clearly, the danger of this impressionist tendency is that it may lead to a certain preciousness and to a deliberate withdrawing of literary groups from the surrounding world of ordinary men and women.

BRITISH DRAMA

Against this school came the expressionists, whose creed bade them accept life and at the same time to urge upon men the glory of man. The expressionist technique generally demands the creation of character types as symbols of social and other forces. It desires no approach toward naturalism, where separate personalities are depicted in terms as near to objective reality as may be possible ; it aims at presenting before audiences the fundamentals of human nature in generalized forms. Above all, it preaches the importance of the human as opposed to the mechanical. These qualities are well shown in such a play as Georg Kaiser's Gas (translated by Mr Ashley Dukes, 1923), where the figures are typical, the language is devoid of naturalistic terms, the war between man and the machine is emphasized. In Germany the school gained strength through Ernst Toller's Masse-Mensch (translated by Mr Dukes, 1924), and in America it found an exponent in Mr Elmer Rice, whose The Adding Machine (1923) revealed the same essential features as appear in Kaiser's play.

Still more recently, because of the special conditions operative in the life there, Russia has aimed at producing a kind of drama where the machine is not opposed, as it is by the expressionists, but is extolled, is praised as something which has a glory and a worth in itself, something without which the man of the future might not be. This movement, however, together with the Continental "Neue Sachlichkeit," may be neglected here as not affecting the development of the English stage.

THE FORCES OF REVOLT

Realism, then, was attacked in pre-Hitler Germany by impressionist and expressionist; the former may incline at times toward the older romanticism, but both are forward-looking movements, not retrospective. Other countries have, of course, in various ways aided the development of both these styles. In Russia Leonid Andreiev had already anticipated much of the new aims when he wrote The Life of Man in 1906 and King Hunger in 1907; slightly later Nicholai Evreinov's The Theatre of the Soul (1915), although not wholly satisfying as a work of art, indicated further extensions of the drama away from naturalistic forms. Italy gave us Luigi Pirandello, who, in Six Characters in Search of an Author (1921), found expression in dramatic form for an idea equivalent to the scientific conceptions of relativity. In Czecho-Slovakia Karel Capek essayed new fields in R.U.R. (translated by Mr Paul Selver, 1923) and The Insect Play (adapted by Mr Clifford Bax in collaboration with Sir Nigel Playfair, 1923). In France the new movements consolidated themselves in the théâtres d'avant-garde under Gaston Baty, Charles Dullin, Louis Jouvet, and Georges Pitoeff, with the support of such venturers as the Compagnie des Quinze under Saint-Denis. These theatres welcomed a regular group of authors whose whole endeavour se résume dans cette recherche des nouveaux moyens d'expression which the Germans too were seeking; they desired to "retheatrelize the theatre." From Denys Amiel to Jean-Jacques Bernard, from Paul Claudel to Henri-René Lenormand, they pitted their strength against the earlier standards of realism. Kindred movements are to be seen in America, from Mr Thornton Wilder's Our Town (1938) and The Skin of Our Teeth (1942) to Mr Maxwell Anderson's Winterset (1935) and High Tor (1936).

If these various forces of progress be analysed in search of fundamental characteristics it will be found that the dramatists aimed at two things in particular—a more profound view of life than was introduced by the majority of the realists and a different medium of expression. All have recognized that the naturalistic conversation cultivated from 1890 to 1920 is insufficient, that the terms of life can never be the terms of art. Comedy may use a select choice of ordinary conversational periods, but serious drama, particularly that serious drama which aspires toward the emotion of tragedy, demands a form of dialogue which shall be raised above the levels of the familiar and the commonplace. If great themes are to be dealt with in drama a medium for great dialogue too must be found. So far, it seems, the final satisfaction of this need has not been achieved; but a consideration of the ways of approach toward a solving of the problem may best be deferred to the section which deals with the English dramatists.

BRITISH DRAMA

CHAPTER II

GENERAL CONDITIONS

THE English dramatists, on the whole, have been less enterprising than their Continental fellows. Since 1920 we have witnessed many changes in the theatre, but our stagecraft, in spite of the example given by Mr Gordon Craig, has remained lagging behind the experimentation in scenic forms abroad, and our dramatic work has exhibited no such tendencies toward revolutionary innovations as were apparent in Germany and America. This may not, of course, be entirely harmful—of that time alone can judge; but we cannot overlook the fact that we lack almost entirely a self-conscious avant-garde policy in our theatres and that a certain atmosphere of satisfied acceptance of existing conditions contrasts markedly with the enthusiastic and sometimes artistically acrimonious controversies over rival styles which animated the German, the American, and the French theatres alike.

Looking round on the English playhouses of to-day, we are bound to recognize the operation of forces both good and bad. Within recent years the cinema and the wireless have come to take their hold upon the populace at large, and both, it may be thought, are working against the success of the theatre. The wireless must induce many who might otherwise have gone to seek entertainment in a play to content themselves with a cheaper kind of entertainment at home. The cinema, because of its accessibility, its more frequent change of programme, and its relative cheapness, undoubtedly draws many within its doors. In some respects we seem almost to be back in the forties of the last century, with a distinct cleavage between the legitimate and the illegitimate, between major and minor. The analogy is the nearer in that the cinema frankly makes use of all those elements of popular appeal which had served the melodrama in the past. Spectacularism is used there freely ; appeal is made to that desire of throwing off the meanly sordid and monotonous surroundings of actual life in order to enter, if but for an hour, into a world of romance ; as in the melodrama, the film exploits the world of crime and sensation.

BRITISH DRAMA

Recognizing the power which all these things have on the popular mind, certain theatres have attempted to meet the cinema on its own terms, just as Drury Lane in 1830 exploited the spectacular effects on which the Surrey and Sadler's Wells based their success. During the late twenties and the early thirties of this century we witnessed the production of great spectacular pieces such as The White Horse Inn, Waltzes from Vienna, The Miracle, and Cavalcade, all deliberately designed with this end in view. We had, too, a run of 'thrillers' and 'crook-plays' planned to rival the popular 'gangster' films. We had pieces, like Street Scene, based on the technique of the screen. In some ways these effects were justified. It is an undoubted fact that recent developments have revealed to us three distinctly new methods of technique—the technique of the silent film, the technique of the 'talkie,' and the technique of the wireless play. In the first the appeal is visual only, in the last it is purely aural ; the second comes closer to the double appeal of the stage. Inevitably and rightly these new forms of art have modified and enlarged the dramatic consciousness. Even before 1920 an appeal was made by Marinetti, the Italian 'futurist,' for a new theatrical technique based on an appreciation of what the new spirit in the cinema implied. In the cinema he saw a freshly developed art-form capable of awakening a new spirit in the theatre. He would have none of your acts or long scenes, but would split up each play into a number of short episodes, each terse and symbolically significant—just such a series of succinct and effective pictures as we find in the film. It is not difficult to trace the influence of this conception in many expressionistic plays of to-day. The device is used in Toller's Masse-Mensch, in Kaiser's Gas, in Mr Munro's The Rumour ; in a milder form it is to be seen even in historical plays like Werfel's Juarez und Maximilian or the Napoleon (1932) adapted by John Drinkwater from the Italian of Giovacchino Forzano and Benito Mussolini. Similarly the wireless technique has come to influence some modern writers, although here perhaps it is more difficult to trace direct and critically appreciable influence. Out of experimentation in the form of the sightless play grew Berkeley's magnificent The White Château and the poignant The Quest of Elizabeth, as well as Mr Dukes' The Dumb Wife of Cheap-side; in America the same experimentation has given us Mr Archibald MacLeish's powerful The Fall of the City.

GENERAL CONDITIONS

While we may recognize in the influence of these entirely new forms a vitalizing spirit, and while we may welcome all the endeavours on the part of the dramatists to make use of such suggestions as are freely offered to them here—while, too, we may recognize that the true way of progress lies, not in merely condemning film or wireless and proceeding as though they were not—we must feel that the attempt made merely to rival the appeal of the cinema by means of spectacular shows is definitely a false step. If it comes to spectacle the film can achieve effects far more splendid than can be realized in the theatre. The worth of The White Horse Inn and of Cavalcade may perhaps be justified by the resultant success of these pieces, but from these can spring no fundamental advance in the world of the theatre. They are imitative merely of externals in the film; Toller's Masse-Mensch and Mr Munro's The Rumour are adapting basic technique and applying that to another form of artistry.

The success of the cinema, especially after the introduction and improvement of methods of sound-reproduction, has been mightily deplored in our own times. There are some who believe that ultimately it will kill the stage as a popular form of artistic entertainment. Considerable justification for this point of view exists. Apart from the fact that some managements are deliberately endeavouring to reproduce the external elements of film appeal in their playhouses, we have seen many theatres turned, temporarily or permanently, into cinemas, and we have heard countless complaints from the theatres of smaller audiences and lack of general support. All this is unquestionably true, yet if one is not entirely pessimistic one may see other aspects of the existing conditions which give hope for the future. The success of the touring companies sponsored during the War by CEMA (now the Arts Council) shows that there are thousands of people who still feel the need of the theatre, and who, particularly in times of crisis, demand from the stage not merely entertainment, but entertainment that is spiritually satisfying.

BRITISH DRAMA

In this connexion it is worthy of remark that it is within recent years that there has grown up that vast and increasing amateur movement encouraged and supervised by the British Drama League, the Scottish Community Drama Association, and the Unity Theatre. Primarily the activities of these bodies are directed toward the production of plays by amateurs only, but indirectly the work of these organizations must have a deep influence upon the professional theatres. The potential audience is being increased ; people who never thought of plays are being induced to act ; and from amateur acting the attendance at theatres to see others act must undoubtedly come. Moreover, this potential audience is being, so to speak, educated. We do not want an audience of priggish, highbrow spectators in our play-houses, but we do want men and women capable of appreciating the requirements of the stage, the technical difficulties involved, and the aims of producer and actor ; the basis for this appreciation is surely being prepared by the active support of the three organizations and through the medium of such journals as Drama and The Scottish Stage.

Not least encouraging among recent movements in the theatre was the success of various festivals, pioneered by Sir Barry Jackson's first Malvern Festival of 1929. No festival on such a scale would have been possible in 1909 : during the thirties not only was the Malvern Festival widely supported, but other festival centres attracted numerous spectators anxious not only to be amused, but to understand and appreciate. Interrupted by the War, this festival idea shows promise of being reborn as soon as conditions permit.

GENERAL CONDITIONS

The Malvern Festival proved both that the really intelligent and enthusiastic audience had not been killed by the cinema and that in this country there was an activity correspondent to such Continental activities as led to the dramatic festival at Salzburg.

Whatever is lacking, then, there is no need for gloomy prognostications. The cinema and the theatre may well exist side by side ; appreciation for the art of the one need not be antagonistic to an appreciation for the art of the other. Indeed, in its own way, by an enlarging of the scope of our imagination, by the novelty of its form, and by the stimulus it exerts, the cinema may be regarded as actively assisting the stage in its progressive development.

CHAPTER III

THE RELICS OF REALISM AND SIGNS OF CHANGE

THAT the realistic movement was not completely dissipated about the year 1920 is shown by the work of a number of modern playwrights, yet the main force of realism was then undoubtedly spent. A number of those writers who built up the stage between 1890 and 1920 still continue to produce works in the naturalistic style, and some younger authors of unquestioned promise have followed in the path blazed out by them; nevertheless, their efforts are seen to be retrospective always. The passing of an old style and the coming of a new is, indeed, nowhere better indicated than in the deliberate alteration of tone in the later work of some of the greater and more creative authors who have carried on their activities from the first decades of the century up to the present. Among these Mr Shaw is, of course, by far the most important.

(i) GEORGE BERNARD SHAW

In many respects it is not correct to discuss Mr Shaw's later plays separately here, for, from his earliest experiments, he had introduced an element of fantasy and supernaturalistic humour which differentiated his work from that of most of his companions. In spite of Androcles' delightful lion, however, and in spite of the charming unrealities of life in imaginative Bulgaria, this note of fantasy does not reach full proportions till we come to Mr Shaw's later dramas. The dividing-line is well marked by Heart-break House, described as "A Fantasia in the Russian Manner on English Themes," in 1919. This was followed by Back to Methuselah (1921), Saint Joan (1923), The Apple Cart (1929)—"a Political Extravaganza"—the still more bizarre and eccentric Too True to be Good (1932), and King

THE RELICS OF REALISM

Charles's Golden Days (1939). The gradual development in all of these from modified naturalism to frank imaginative treatment is manifest. No surer indication could be found of the main desires of the age, for Mr Shaw, through his keen power of observation and his sensitive appreciation of public moods, is a kind of dramatic barometer of the times. He has shown, more obviously than any other dramatist, the altered condition of the public mind since 1920. Nor is it only in form that his later work departs from his earlier. The change in form is merely an outward semblance of an inner change. The older realistic drama had, for the most part, been occupied with man as a social animal. Galsworthy's plays, Granville-Barker's plays, the plays of Hankin and the 'repertory' school, had rarely gone beyond a consideration of the human personality in contact with other human personalities or with those more abstract social forces which, almost unwittingly, they had called into being. Something more than this is demanded by the new age, something of that quality of 'religion' for which H. A. Jones pleaded as far back as the nineties. Man sub specie æternitatis or man in his deeper inward self is called for by these new spectators. Already Mr Shaw had made several steps in this direction, but it was only in the later plays that he developed that added strength and depth of purpose which the new mood demands. Heartbreak House, at any rate up to its inharmonious conclusion, was by far the greatest drama he had yet written; Back to Methuselah, whatever one may think of its philosophy, trembles with an imaginative passion of which Mr Shaw had hitherto shown himself ignorant; Saint Joan, besides being a brilliant exposition of theories concerning a past age, hovers on the verge of mystical emotion; The Apple Cart and Too True to be Good, although lighter and more fantastic in form, deal with fundamental problems in the inner life of man. A new note of poetry has entered in, colouring and deepening such tendencies in that direction as Mr Shaw had shown in Androcles and the Lion. In these plays Mr Shaw has indicated that the modern drama which shall be expressive of the modern spirit must be a 'religious,' in the sense of a philosophic, drama. Maybe he himself is only carrying to fulfilment tendencies already marked in his early work, but then, as has already been pointed out, that early work, although popular and exerting a widespread influence, was not wholly characteristic of the ordinary theatre of its time. Mr Shaw, even in the nineties, had looked ahead and felt dissatisfaction with the form of naturalism which alone served in that epoch to establish standards newer and more vital than the standards of an outworn romanticism.

(ii) THE CONTINUANCE OF REALISM

Some elements of a similar kind, although perhaps not so deeply marked, are evident in the work of other dramatists of the 1900-20 school. Galsworthy permits a slightly new note of 'philosophy' to enter into his Loyalties (1922) and The Forest (1924). Mr St John Ervine leaves the present day to write a costume drama in The Lady of Belmont (1925). Sir Arthur Pinero—unsatisfactorily, it is true—turns to a 'poetic' framework for The Enchanted Cottage (1922). Harley Granville-Barker tries a new style in The Secret Life (1923), a play marred by a certain incoherency and by a strange mixture of would-be naturalistic and enigmatically symbolic language; in His Majesty (1928) he gives reign to his fancy, and, while keeping the realistic form, allows his mind to dwell a space in an imaginary Carpathia with figures representative of fundamental moods—the fiery Count Czernyak, the revolutionary Bruckner, the time-serving Dr Madrassy, the politely and urbanely sardonic King Henry XIII. With this last-mentioned play might be named the kindred "fantastic comedy" by Miss Cicely Hamilton, The Old Adam (1924; printed 1926), in which too the action takes place in a Balkan Paphlagonia and current tendencies are symbolically discussed within a framework which has the outward semblance of realism.

These writers, however, who have, in one way or another, altered their style with the passing from the old to the new find some companions in the modern period who deliberately look back to the realistic style and who, in almost unchanged technique, carry on the traditions of 1890-1920. It cannot be denied that some fine work has been done in this form during the last ten years, but, with our eyes upon major movements in the world of the drama, we cannot avoid noting that the particular mould chosen by these playwrights is one which, it would seem, has largely spent its force. No denial of the worth of their works is here intended; Otway's Venice Preserv'd is a great play, yet similarly the historian of the drama is forced to observe that it goes back for its inspiration to a dramatic form which in its time had long been abandoned. Among these dramatists one of the most important is Miss Clemence Dane. Her A Bill of Divorcement (1921) is a masterly study in the theme of heredity, showing a skilful technique and a dialogue distinguished, yet easy and natural. The story of Margaret, forced into sacrificing herself for her husband, returned from an asylum as from the dead, and of her daughter Sydney, equally forced to abandon her marriage, is told with a directness that places this play among the finest that the realistic school had to give to us. A trifle less strong, but nevertheless effective, is Mariners (written 1925-26; U.S.A. 1927), with its subtle study of the mild little rector, Benjamin Cobb, married to the vulgar Lily. Unfortunately, here, as in a number of realistic plays of the modern period, a certain note of sentimentality has crept in. This element of sentimentality is due to the fact that where, in accordance with modern desires, the realistic drama strives to depict more than the mere outward surroundings and obvious emotions, it tends to overstep its bounds. In such a play as Chains the playwright does little more than depict; but in Mariners Miss Dane shows a desire for something beyond mere depiction. An element of purpose informs her work, but that very purpose has the effect of introducing a note of disharmony. One may find a similar failing in two Cockney plays—Charles McEvoy's The Likes of Her (1923) and Mr Ernest George's Down our Street (1929). The former is saved from oversentimentalization because of the exceedingly vivid picture it presents of East End life; yet the scene where Sally, magnanimous beyond her station, permits the wretched Florrie to break her china, and the other scene where Florrie, contrite, speeds off to tell the returned George Miles the truth, are on the verge of the pathetically propagandist. Another kind of Sally is given a prominent place in the Belle of Down our Street. She too is granted a vision above her surroundings, although the dramatist has not been consistent in his portrait. Here the sentimentalization becomes more obvious because there is less technical brilliance than in McEvoy's play. To abandon Tessie, in whom interest is first centred, seems to have been a capital error.

THE RELICS OF REALISM

Of recent years the greatest success in this style has been attained by Mr John Van Druten. Mr Van Druten's technical skill is unquestioned; his ability to present arresting situations and to deal with them brilliantly in the realistic style has gained for him both critical esteem and popularity. Yet his plays are backward- and not forward-looking. Although Young Woodley (1928) is magnificently done, with its neat, clear-cut characterization and its crisp situations, although our attention never wanders here, and the dialogue never strays from the naturalistic convention, this drama, brilliant as it may be, seems to belong to the older type: it is reproducing an earlier style rather than experimenting in fresh forms. The same criticism may be passed on all Mr Van Druten's work. In Diversion (1928) there is a kindred clarity in structure and in characterization, and the play almost reaches to a genuine tragic note. The last scene, with its atmosphere of passion and despair concealed during the entry of Muriel and Owen, is magnificently conceived. After All (1929) is less exact and simple in planning—perhaps it was a mistake to refuse to allow such an important character as Greta to enter the stage save in one short scene—but here, as in the comedy London Wall (1931), the dialogue retains the qualities of naturalistic ease. In all of these we recognize Mr Van Druten's unquestioned skill and strength and at the same time are conscious of something lacking. Even The Return of the Soldier (1928), based on Miss Rebecca West's novel, wants that quality hard to analyse and intangible which we demand from the higher drama to-day. Good though it may be in its naturalistic style, there is both an absence of deeper power and a tendency, in this story of a man whose memory moves back fifteen years toward an early love, to sentimentality. The same style is used in his later Old Acquaintance (1941).

THE RELICS OF REALISM

Similar features appear in the once-lauded Journey's End (1928) of Mr R. C. Sherriff. At one time almost every critic was acclaiming this play as the masterpiece of the century, and Mr Sherriff as the greatest genius of his age. That he had caught the secret of the naturalistic style is true, that through that naturalistic style he made a direct though temporary appeal is certain ; but, viewed in relation to other plays of a similar kind, his work must be recognized to be wanting in strength. Within the naturalistic field it comes nowhere near Miss Dane's A Bill of Divorcement, where character and purpose are both profoundly visualized ; and, without mentioning Mr O'Casey's The Silver Tassie, wherein a different technique is employed, it, as a drama, seems to fall below Allan Monkhouse's The Conquering Hero (1924 ; published 1923), in which a kind of concentrated passion gives nobility and dignity to the treatment. Monkhouse's characters are deeply and vividly incised ; his fine figure of Francis Iredale is no less distinct than his artistic Chris, his single-minded Margaret than his more complex Helen. Perhaps, however, in another play, First Blood (1924), Monkhouse shows the pitfalls that lie in the way of the dramatist who wishes to pursue the old path. First Blood is a study of industrial strife with the revolutionary 'men,' represented by Jack Livsey and Tom Eden, pitted against the 'masters,' represented in Sir Samuel Stott. Interesting though this study is, it lacks the freshness that informed the earlier examples of this school, and it descends close to sentimentalism. When Galsworthy wrote Strife and when Mr Ervine wrote Mixed Marriage these dramatists were doing new things ; they were genuinely creating. When Monkhouse turns to First Blood he seems to be unconsciously imitating. The atmosphere of Strife dominates the play, and the conclusion reminds us of Mr Ervine's conclusion. When Nora fell by a stray bullet Mr Ervine was greatly imagining a situation of his own devising ; in Monkhouse's hands the similar death of Phyllis, followed by the death of Lionel, seems to become merely sentimental because lacking in vividity and strength.

This sentimentalism colours many plays of the kind produced during recent years. Another example might be given in Mr H. B. Trevelyan's The Dark Angel (1928), which shows, in a prologue, Kitty, romantically in love, spending the night with Hilary Trent and pledging him eternal devotion. The play then passes over some years. Kitty believes Trent killed in the War ; she clings to his memory, but finds herself drifting into a love for Gerald Shannon. Suddenly the discovery is made that Trent is alive, permanently blinded ; magnanimously he releases her from her oath. This play has distinction, but the characters are shadowy, and there is that mixture of moods which tends toward the sentimental. The attempt to introduce something of the element of wonder, through the means of the gipsy woman Roma, fails of its purpose.

Mr J. R. Ackerley's fine study in the naturalistic style, The Prisoners of War (1925), gains strength from the prevailing atmosphere, which is cleverly suggested, and from the careful studies of character introduced. There is little external action here, and the avoidance of this enables the author to put greater stress on the inner conflict in the natures of his dramatis personæ. The sense of nervous tension, of strange moods born of a strange environment, is excellently conveyed by means of a dialogue which, although it never lapses from the naturalistic, yet gives an impression of dignity and grace. The concentrated effect of The Prisoners of War might well be contrasted with the atmosphere of C. B. Fernald's To-morrow (1928), where the attempt to depict human emotion in the event of another war is vitiated by the complexity of the plot and the diversity of style in the dialogue.

Among those writers who have pursued this path none has won greater fame than Mr A. A. Milne. Mr Milne is one of the few followers of Sir James Barrie in our generation, but he wears the familiar Barrie-esque garments with a difference. At a first glance his style is amazingly like that of his master. The stage-directions are cast in the same non-dramatic and whimsical mood. In the second act of Michael and Mary (1930; U.S.A. 1929) the father clergyman thus "goes down the stairs . . . to the station . . . to the lonely Bedfordshire vicarage . . . saying over in his mind all that Michael said to him, all the loving things which he meant to have said to Michael." Mr Milne's play world, like that of Sir James Barrie, orients its affections and its attentions toward the baby, chubby and sweetly cooing. In Michael and Mary Mary says, "'Children, Michael? Oh, I would love to have your son. Can't I just think about him for a little?' (She thinks about him.)" And in The Great Broxopp (1923), when Broxopp has spoken of his great scheme for a new baby food he and his wife "gaze eagerly into the future, Broxopp seeing his million babies, Nancy seeing her one," until the curtain mercifully descends. This Barrie-like sentimentalism is not, however, copied exactly. Sir James Barrie makes free use of the supernatural; Mr Milne keeps his atmosphere strictly human. A good example of this is given in The Dover Road (1922). Mr Latimer there is Mr Milne's Lob, but instead of being a recreated Pan or Puck he is only a kind-hearted millionaire bent on showing runaway couples that the path to Paris is paved with perils. The technique here is excellent, but the atmosphere can be described only as sentimental. Sentimentalism, generally associated with wise but quiet ladies who are gifted with a rich sense of humour, is freely exploited in Mr Milne's theatre. In The Great Broxopp the lady is Nancy; in Michael and Mary it is Mary. The latter play was published with a preface in which Mr Milne wittily endeavours to defend himself from the sentimental charge, but this barely carries conviction. Michael and Mary is a charming study in idealism, but there is failure in an insufficient motivating of the bigamous marriage, and frequently the idealism loses strength and quality. A similar woman-type appears in the Ariadne Winter of Ariadne, or Business First (1925); she successfully cures her John of his odious pettiness. Her sister is Jennifer in To Have the Honour (1924), a play which presents to us plain but charming Michael Brown masquerading as Prince Michael Robolski of Neo-Slavonia and Jennifer, his wife, disporting herself as a general's widow. In Mr Pim Passes By (1921) Olivia betrays similar features. This is one of Mr Milne's cleverest plays; Mr Pim himself and the part he enacts are real creations. Set within more fantastic surroundings, the same lady appears again in Princess Ameril, the affianced bride of King Hilary XXIV in Portrait of a Gentleman in Slippers (1926). Quite different from the tone of these plays is Success (1923), where, in spite of the intrusion once more of a sentimental colouring, Mr Milne, by his almost despairing acceptance of life's crushing littlenesses, strikes a new tone. The story of Selby Mannock and his earlier love, Lady Carchester, is told with skill, and the sense of success 'closing in' is suggestively conveyed. The dream scene here might be particularly noted as an example of Mr Milne's fine theatrical craftsmanship. One must regret that, with this unquestioned talent and keen appreciation of stage effect, he has not pursued more fully the path indicated in this play.

THE RELICS OF REALISM

BRITISH DRAMA

Some other dramatists, such as Mr Benn W. Levy, manifestly aim at bringing to the naturalistic form something of a deeper and more philosophic purpose. In The Devil (1930) Mr Levy chooses a theme of a religious nature, and in Mrs Moonlight (1928; published 1929) introduces an atmosphere which extends beyond the immediately tangible and the rational. Mr Levy's work is undoubtedly noteworthy—particularly for its masterly dialogue and its gallery of effective portraits. This realistic style has been pursued, of course, by many besides those mentioned above. Mr Mordaunt Shairp has his psychological study, The Offence (1925), and his essay in abnormal sex relations, The Green Bay-tree (1933); Mr Edward Percy his striking dialect play, If Four Walls Told (1922); Mr Halcott Glover, veering from the epically planned Biblical drama, Exodus

THE RELICS OF REALISM

(1923), which he wrote in collaboration with Mr H. F. Rubinstein, turns in The Second Round (1923) and God's Amateur (1928) to complex realistic themes. Such plays still gain success in the theatre: the pathetic Cynara (1930) of Mr H. M. Harwood and Mr R. Gore-Browne and the sentimentally conceived Autumn Crocus (1931) and Dear Octopus (1938) of Miss C. L. Anthony (Dodie Smith) all have had considerable followings. In this style Mr Hermon Ould comes forward with The Light Comedian (1928), Aimée and Philip Stuart with The Cat's Cradle (1926) and Clara Gibbings (1929), Miss E. M. Delafield with To See Ourselves (1931).

If the sentimental mood dominates in many of these plays, others show a distinct bias toward the melodramatic—for the realists are often driven, in an endeavour to give dramatic interest to their drab themes, to fall back upon exploitation of the sensational. Love on the Dole (1935) by Mr Walter Greenwood and Mr Ronald Gow exhibits this quality, and it is strongly marked in the plays of Mr Emlyn Williams—Night Must Fall (1935), The Corn is Green (1938), The Light of Heart (1940), a study of theatrical life, The Morning Star (1941), an air-raid play, Druid's Rest (1943), set in a Welsh hamlet, and, finally, The Wind of Heaven (1945), also set in Wales, and perhaps the most successful of all his works. Melodramatic episode is piled on melodramatic episode in Mr W. S. Maugham's For Services Rendered (1932), and much of the same note enters into Dr A. J. Cronin's Jupiter Laughs (1940). Mr Keith Winter shares this mood in The Shining Hour (1934), The Rats of Norway (1933), and Old Music (1937).

Occasionally the realistic style seems to succeed in striking out to something fresh, as in Mr Merton Hodge's sensitive The Wind and the Rain (1933) and Ronald Mackenzie's Musical Chairs (1931), but even here analysis seems to reveal that the style itself, which had such power at the end of the last century, has lost its inspiring force. Musical Chairs was highly acclaimed on its first appearance, and one may freely admit that Mackenzie's early death was a hard blow to the stage; but its theme (the conflict between the amoral artist-dreamer and the money-making practical man) is an old one, and caricature (as in the delineation of the American, Samuel Plagett) colours its depiction of character. A somewhat similar judgment may be passed on Peter Ustinov's The Banbury Nose (1944). This drama shows a real dramatist at work, yet there is rather promise than true achievement here: with all its excellent characterization and the apparent novelty of its movement backward in time, it merely says again what has been so often said during the past fifty years concerning the clash between young and old, while in its orientation a strong trend toward the sentimental is evident.

Among other works of a similar kind produced during the War may be mentioned Mr W. Chetham Strode's study of the problems of demobilization, Young Mrs Barrington (1945), and his play of schoolboys, The Guinea Pig (1946), Mr Terence Rattigan's The Winslow Boy (1946), another drama of childhood, Mr Thomas Job's quietly sensational Uncle Harry (1944), Mr Ted Willis's air-raid play, Buster (1943), and his All Change Here (1944), Miss Esther McCracken's Living Room (1943), a kind of feminine Widowers' Houses, and Miss Joan Temple's grim dramatization of the horrors of evacuation, No Room at the Inn (1945).

In spite of the numerous works of this kind produced during recent years, however, it must be agreed that, so far as serious plays are concerned, we have passed the period of creative brilliance in this particular style. Mr William Archer did a good thing, in The Old Drama and the New, to call attention to the value of the realistic plays of our own time, but already at the period when that book was written (1923) the school of naturalism had in general lost its strength and that vital sense of adventurous discovery which is the prime necessity for all great art.

CHAPTER IV

THE COMEDY OF MANNERS

UNTIL the Second World War broke upon us there seemed to be the possibility that in our times a new comedy of manners might flourish. The Restoration comedy resulted from conditions when a keen observation of life was allied to an intellectual mood of disillusion and a bitingly satiric treatment of social follies. That this Restoration comedy made appeal to the pre-War age was demonstrated by the considerable number of revivals which it witnessed during the twenties and thirties, by the publication both in de luxe and popular format of the collected works of authors in that style, and by the attention which these dramatists attracted among the critics. Congreve, Wycherley, and Etherege were understood as they had never been understood since they first brought their plays before the courtiers of the seventeenth century.

Already in the earlier period (1890-1920), as has been seen, there had been a revival of wit and a definite approach toward purely intellectual comedy; this movement gained in power from 1920 onward. Wilde had re-established the form, and Jones experimented similarly in The Liars; Mr Bernard Shaw seized on a good deal that was vital in the comedy of manners and used it for his own purposes. Perhaps, however, none of these so completely captured the spirit that animated the Restoration theatre as did Mr Somerset Maugham. Mr Maugham is a dramatist whose work is hard to assess. He stands for actuality and all it implies in the theatre, yet his works seem to have a value beyond that he would give them himself. "The day before yesterday's newspaper is not more dead," he writes in the preface to the second volume of his collected Plays (1931), "than the play of twenty years ago. . . . The foundation of living drama is actuality. It must be natural above all things, and it achieves the illusion of truth by reproducing as exactly as the exigencies of the theatre permit the manners and customs of the day." In most of his comedies and dramas he has striven to keep this purpose in view, but in spite of that one has the impression that at least some of his works will remain as those of other authors have remained. This attitude of his presents one difficulty to the critical historian. Another is that Mr Maugham's dramatic activity is of extraordinary diversity. In 1902 he started his career with a drama in German, Schiffbrüchig, and since then he has turned out plays in half a dozen different styles. Some are studies in passionate situation. The Tenth Man (1910) thus deals, arrestingly but at times a trifle sentimentally, with a financial 'giant' who thinks all men have their price; although Mr Maugham has made us interested in this George Winter, the play as a whole is really less vivid than Jones' early The Rogue's Comedy (1896), which challenges comparison for various reasons. Smith (1909) shows sentimentalism run riot with its contrast of the upper middle-class 'Society' set and Thomas Freeman, the healthy young Australian; the same theme, but more strongly, is continued in The Land of Promise (1914). As representative of this mood in the later period of his career, one might refer to Cæsar's Wife (1919), where a strange mixture of 'love and duty' and delicate raillery causes disharmony, and to The Letter (1927), a full-blooded 'drama' of love, murder, and retribution in the Malay Peninsula. For these Mr Maugham will not be remembered. As early as 1908, however, in Mrs Dot, he had suggested greater possibilities. Mrs Dot is farcically conceived, but there is evident the following of Wilde's style. This is continued in Penelope (1909), with its charming picture in the manners style of Professor Golightly and its frank air of intellectualism. In The Circle (1921) Mr Maugham brought this mood to more adequate expression; here characters are more precisely drawn, and the dialogue has a peculiarly even poise. In spite of the fact that there is a problem underlying its wit, in this play Mr Maugham challenges the Restoration masters on their own ground, marking an advance on Wilde by the subtle use of the mot de situation where the dramatic setting adds to or gives point to the easy repartee. The likeness of Mr Maugham's work to that of the seventeenth century is even more clearly shown in Our Betters (U.S.A. 1917; London 1923), which is almost pure Wycherley. The setting is aristocratic; the people introduced live idle lives, intrigue alone occupying their thoughts. The brilliance of the social portraiture argues the dramatist's mastery of his craft. Eminently rationalistic, too, is The Constant Wife (1927), with its calm acceptance of existing conditions, with its Restoration emphasis on the transitory nature of love. In The Breadwinner (1930) there is treated the thoughtless and boring brilliance of the young. Judy's remark that "since the War the amateurs have entirely driven the professionals out of business" might be taken as Mr Maugham's last sardonic motto.

THE COMEDY OF MANNERS

This conflict of young and old, the 'generations theme,' which provided material for many serious playwrights, has gained several fresh exponents during recent years. Harold Chapin's The New Morality (produced 1920) is delightful Congreve where Mr Maugham's plays are savage Wycherley. The story of Betty Jones, who quarrels with every one because of her appreciation of new standards, is excellently and wittily told. The young generation has its fervent propagandist in Mr Miles Malleston, whose The Fanatics (1924) made plea for revised conceptions of social life; it found its light-hearted exponent in Mr Noel Coward, whose plays, like Colley Cibber's, contain much that sounds like wit even if, on examination, the elements of true wit are found in them to be lacking. Mr Coward is a complete master of the theatre, and most of his works put absolute reliance on the actor and his surroundings. The Collected Sketches and Lyrics of 1931 makes painful reading, and the success of Cavalcade (1931) is a success of spectacular brilliance and immediate appeal to popular sentiment. Yet Mr Coward showed in his earlier work an amazing promise, and during the War produced one play which is likely to remain long in the memory. The Rat Trap (1924) was an extraordinary piece of naturalistic writing for a young man, and in The Young Idea (1923) he produced a comedy of genuine brilliance. Save for a weakness in the introduction of the American at the end, this play, with its irrepressible Gerda and Sholto, bubbles with airy charm, and if the bubbles of wit burst we have at least had the delight of their iridescent laughter. Finally in Blithe Spirit (1941) he wrote a comedy which, save for its last scene, is almost perfect in its poise and fantastic grace.

Mr Frederick Lonsdale works best in the Maugham style. Spring Cleaning (1925) seriously and somewhat unsatisfactorily deals with the problem of a wife's affections. Margaret Sones is being misled by a wretched crew of bright young things—Lady Jane, Archie Wells, and Bobby Williams—and is forcibly brought back to reason by her powerfully minded husband. The bitter satire of modern life reminds us of Mr Maugham's work. Mr Lonsdale's most interesting play has a kindred atmosphere. In The Last of Mrs Cheyney (1925) he displays an unquestioned technical brilliance and produces a really charming scene in the reading of Lord Elton's foolish letter. A sentimental conclusion mars what might have otherwise been regarded as a worthy partner to The Circle. In another way Mr Munro has spoilt his At Mrs Beam's (1921), a play which seemed to give a promise which, unfortunately, its author has not pursued farther. Here, though the 'boarding-house' episodes are magnificently done, the 'romantic' atmosphere is unsatisfactory. Mr Ervine, turning from serious drama, produced a skilful and successful comedy of manners in The First Mrs Fraser (1928); John Drinkwater similarly gave us his delightfully topsy-turvy Bird in Hand (1928); and J. B. Fagan turned out some excellent period and modern comedies—And So to Bed (1926) and The Improper Duchess (1931)—which, although designed perhaps for immediate appeal, take their place in the range of modern comic drama. Similarly light and crisp are Mr H. M. Harwood's The Man in Possession (1930), Mr J. Hastings Turner's The Lilies of the Field (1923), with its delightful portraits of the gay Catherine and Elizabeth, J. Hartley Manners' joyous Peg o' my Heart (1916), and Mr Emlyn Williams' essay in the comedy of humour, Spring 1600 (1945).

THE COMEDY OF MANNERS

With these might be noted the charming fantasies designed by Sir Alan Herbert for production at the Lyric Theatre, Hammersmith, under Sir Nigel Playfair. La Vie Parisienne (1929), Tantivy Towers (1931), and Derby Day (1932), while in one respect indicating the modern desire of escape from formal realism, demonstrated in another the pre-War prevalent love of wit and laughter. Nor, in this connexion, should we omit mention of the flourishing of farce during the last decade. Farce may be a less important form of artistry than comedy and must always owe much to the talents of the performers, but it seems as if many of our modern farces are better constructed and more whimsically conceived than the majority of such pieces in the past. It Pays to Advertise (1924), by Mr Roi Cooper Megrue and Walter Hackett, was an excellent piece of its kind, and Mr W. A. Darlington's Alf's Button (1924) wrought a delightfully fantastic recreation of the Arabian Nights atmosphere. More recently Mr Terence Rattigan has given us his French without Tears (1936) and Mr Gerald Savory his George and Margaret (1937).

The War, however, brought an end to this comedy of manners. It may return, although it is doubtful whether the social conditions of the period after 1945 are as likely to encourage the display of theatrical wit as were those of the interbellum age; and even the most cursory knowledge of theatrical history convinces us that for this kind of comedy to flourish the social atmosphere must possess certain qualities likely to inspire the playwrights. The comedy of manners is a tender plant and will not bloom if cold winds are a-blowing.

CHAPTER V

THE POETIC DRAMA

WHEN, with due critical perspective, the history of drama during the last twenty years comes to be written, it seems probable that the age will be recognized as one which boldly manifested a renaissance of imagination, which exhibited a reaction to the prevailing naturalism of the first years of the twentieth century. Already attention has been drawn to the way in which some of the elder writers have altered their style in accordance with the spirit of the new age ; here will have to be considered the path trodden by those of the moderns whose period of activity belongs largely to recent years.

One recognizes, of course, that (quite apart from the plays of Mr Shaw and Sir James Barrie) a certain element of poetic fantasy is to be discovered in the theatre between 1890 and 1920, but this quality is definitely subordinate to the realistic tendency. Only in Ireland did there flourish a school of dramatists in whose work the poetic imagination suffused their themes, whose aim deviated from the common purpose of reproducing as faithfully as might be the external forms of life. How the strength of that naturalistic movement disappears in our own time has been suggested in an earlier section ; now we must investigate the way or ways whereby the writers of to-day have endeavoured to provide something to take its place. Quite clearly such a movement of reaction may assume many forms. A common aim may be expressed in the opposition to the purely naturalistic, but the methods of attack may be so diverse as to differentiate various schools of this kind from one another quite as much as each is differentiated from their common opponent. In general, perhaps, it might be said that in modern times three such schools (apart from that which has produced the purely spectacular musical plays referred to in an earlier chapter) are clearly to be recognized. The first is the school of poetic drama ; the second is the modernist 'Continental' school ; and the third is that which for convenience may be styled the school of the historical playwrights.

DESIGN BY PAUL SHELVE FOR KAISER'S "GAS"

SCENE IN MEIERHOLD'S THEATRE, MOSCOW

THE POETIC DRAMA

GORDON BOTTOMLEY, LASCELLES ABERCROMBIE, ELIOT, AND AUDEN

The first of these has at present small hold on the commercial theatres ; for this there are several reasons. As we look at the development of drama from the point of view of form we can trace a gradual tendency moving from the elaborate stanzaic dialogue of medieval times, through the simpler 'fourteeners' and decasyllabic couplets of the sixteenth century, to blank verse and prose. In blank verse and prose the Elizabethans found the perfect media for the expression of their dramatic conceptions, whether comic or tragic ; these two forms were carried to a height of glory by Marlowe and by Shakespeare ; they were provided with additional modifications by the writers of the early seventeenth century.

It is at this point that the first serious difficulty enters in. Elizabethan prose speech was itself far more richly patterned and far more poetically figurative than is the ordinary prose of modern times ; it has in it something of the rhythm of passionate utterance ; its cadences have oftentimes a definite regularity of movement. Shakespearian blank verse, therefore, might almost be regarded as a kind of heightened prose utterance, just such a heightened medium as provided a raising of the dialogue medium sufficient for the enunciation of tragic passion and such as could be readily appreciated by spectators whose ears were by custom apt to catch the tones of poetic imagery and melodic utterance. After the seventeenth century, however, two things happened. The Elizabethans had done so much with blank verse, had set so high a model, that later dramatists simply imitated their styles. Blank verse, in other words—at least, so far as the theatre was concerned—ceased to be truly creative ; it lost its original freshness, and the poets who adopted this style found themselves inevitably fettered ; Shakespearian, Marlovian, and Fletcherian cadences persisted in forcing themselves into their work. This imitative blank verse endured throughout the nineteenth century ; in the twentieth Stephen Phillips was still writing in the old tradition. At the same time ordinary prose utterance gradually but surely lost its richness. It became stereotyped and more colloquial ; what had been imaginatively and freshly figurative in the sixteenth century was reduced to fossilized terms. There thus came an abrupt chasm between the common colloquial speech and the now antiquated, because imitative, blank verse. To this must be added the fact that from 1860 onward spectators and actors were being trained in the appreciation of new naturalistic forms, with the results, first, that the stage was left without a sufficient number of actors capable adequately of interpreting poetic dialogue and, second, that modern audiences came to have both a distrust of and a distaste for the purely poetic drama.

To escape from this dilemma there seem to be two, and only two, lines of development open to writers of verse plays ; these two lines of development were, in the earlier years of the present century, fully demonstrated by Lascelles Abercrombie and by Dr Gordon Bottomley respectively. Perhaps, indeed, one might say that the creative spirit in the modern drama is nowhere more clearly indicated than by the fact that, after centuries of imitative utterance, our own days should have witnessed these deliberate and creative movements toward the establishing of fresh standards.

The first way lies in the conscious search so to adapt the earlier verse-forms as to make them once more a vital means of dramatic expression. As Mr Jack Lindsay sees it,

A purification is the first essential ; but that having been achieved we must face the very difficult problem of harmonizing the newly discovered emotional directness with on the one side the mass of modern colloquialisms and on the other side the gorgeous extension of colour-imagery begun by Beddoes and carried through the gaudy rhetoric of Francis Thompson into the explosive nervousities of Edith Sitwell.

THE POETIC DRAMA

The importance of Abercrombie's work in this direction, particularly in his verse drama Deborah (1913), has been noted by Mr Lindsay. Deborah, however, does not stand alone ; Abercrombie continued his search after form, too, in his later works—The Adder (1913), The End of the World (1914), The Staircase (1920), The Deserter (1922), and Phoenix (1923). Fundamentally, Abercrombie endeavoured to bring his poetry into close contact with reality. He was not another singer from fairyland, as was Yeats ; he deliberately departed from the Elizabethan tradition which kept so many writers of the past in its thralldom. Consciously he sought to find a form of blank verse expression which might adequately convey to modern spectators or readers the immediate emotions of our time in terms of poetry. The powerful resonance of his verse, with its peculiar welding of highly imaginative language and of common expressions, presents a notable contribution to dramatic form. An example might be chosen from Deborah, where the terrible plague is thus described :

But I within me
Can see the thing, a ghost as grey as rain,
Fleeces of shadowy air wrapping his shape,
Tall as the winds, standing up over us,
Smiling and idly bandying with his feet
This way and that the writhing bodies like
A man turns rats that have taken the bane he laid.

Here is one quite definite path of escape from the clinging Elizabethan melodies. Unfortunately, two things seem to have prevented Abercrombie from exerting a greater direct influence on the theatre of our times. He was certainly no companion of those nineteenth-century dramatists who despised and neglected the playhouse : he was a poet who appreciated and who knew the stage ; at the same time he was clearly more attracted by the philosophic concept than by the interests of the dramatic theme as such. It is obvious, from the dialogue he gives to such persons as the Mother, the Son, and the Tramp in Blind or to the Parson in Escape, that he was most intent on the expression of an idea. On this is dependent the fact that, after making so notable an experiment in Deborah, he did not pursue much farther the way he himself had indicated ; Phoenix takes as its setting, not a world akin to ours, but a distant and unfamiliar Greece " in the times before the Trojan War," and the magnificently planned The Sale of St Thomas (1931), although divided into six acts and although for the most part cast in dialogue, includes a certain amount of pure narrative which unfits it for stage presentation. Here too, however, he continued his search after an adequate form.

BRITISH DRAMA

It shall be given as you give yourself :
Of which let music be the parable.
Beautiful is the sound of strings and pipes ;
More beautiful the melody in the mind
Made of the sound ; most beautiful of all,
Voices of viols and harps, trumpets and flutes,
Dulcimers, horns, consenting one with another,
And melodies in these voices each on each Conferring grace, each its own loveliness
Elaborating in concord with the rest,
All to achieve one perfect amplitude
Of manifold music, a single dignity
Of shapely intellectual delight.

This speech of Thomas's agrees fundamentally with the experimentation in blank-verse rhythm which characterizes Deborah.

Paradoxically, then, some of those qualities which make Abercrombie's poetry so distinguished in achievement take from the value of his plays, when these are considered from the point of view of the theatre. His calm-eyed and fatalistic attitude to life gives a dignity and strength to his themes, makes them outstanding works in the history of poetic utterance, but there is not enough of character and movement to make them successful on the stage.

This marks one way of approach ; the other finds expression in the plays, particularly the later plays, of Dr Gordon Bottomley. Where Abercrombie has aimed at a translation of ordinary speech into poetic terms Dr Bottomley, seeing the disappearance of the closely associated Elizabethan creative prose and verse, has decided that a completely new start must be made. For this purpose he looks rather to the classical drama of Greece and to the Nō stage of Japan than to the Elizabethan theatre for his inspiration, although it is to be observed that for his two best-known plays, King Lear's Wife (1915) and Gruach (printed 1921, acted 1923), he has turned partly at least to Shakespeare. While Dr Bottomley's work is not easily divided into periods, a consistency of purpose informing all his writings, it may, indeed, be wise to consider first the early dramas, including besides the two mentioned above The Crier by Night (1902), Midsummer Eve (1905), Laodice and Danaë, and The Riding to Lithend (1909), and then the more recent lyric choral plays.

THE POETIC DRAMA

As we survey the first group Dr Bottomley's inventive-ness immediately captures our attention ; this is truly one of his chief qualities, and to it he adds a supremely effective power of suggestion. Shadowy forms move out before us from the darkness of night and fade again into the mystery of which they were born. It is not, however, only the mysterious with which Dr Bottomley has dealt ; his human characters are firmly conceived. Treatment of character, indeed, is that which provides the basic strength of his two important 'Shakespearian' dramas. The road he chooses here is daring ; both plays aim at getting behind Shakespeare's tragedies and at providing a basis from which those tragedies might logically develop.

In King Lear's Wife an effort is made to account for the characters of Lear, Goneril, and Cordelia. Lear is shown to us as a rather wilful, amorous old monarch. He has grown wearied of his aged queen, Hygd, and taken into his house the common and vulgar Gormflaith. The Queen, highly strung and sensitive, suffers under his injustice and dies ; but Goneril, who is a virtuous and somewhat chill Diana, catches something of high purpose in her desire for vengeance. In bitterness she slays Gormflaith, who is discovered to be nothing but a mean prostitute. It is bitterness that dominates the play, bitterness in Lear and in Goneril, bitterness in the miserable death of Queen Hygd. Cordelia moves through it all, a child over-beloved by Lear and hated by Hygd. There is excellent character-drawing here, and the theme is fresh and original. The same qualities of freshness and strength are to be seen in Gruach, which purports to delineate the early life of Lady Macbeth. The young girl, reared in the barrenness of a Scottish fortress, pines for the joy of life. She is about to be married to a man whom she despises, when there arrives at the castle a youthful courtier and soldier, none other than Macbeth. In him she finds what she has been seeking, and the two take flight together. Here Dr Bottomley has taken the Lady Macbeth we know and shown her as she might have been in earlier life—not a cruel, embittered girl, but one full of life, ambitious and striving after she knows not what. It is easy to see that with age these qualities may become exaggerated and warped, developing into the terrible figure of the murderous hostess of Shakespeare's play.

One other drama in this style—although not on a Shakespearean theme—appeared in Britain's Daughter (1921). This is a powerful play of primitive passions, displaying to us Nest, the British princess attended only by the faithful nurse Widan, in the hands of the Romans. There are excellent scenes here, such as the picture of Ennid and the child she is forced to leave with the aged Cadvan. Cadvan's last words have a peculiar significance :

There is no conqueror except the earth :
 The Roman lords will stay too long in Britain,
 Whose water and inbreathed air and soil-borne fruit
 Shall in the darkness of their inwards change
 Their secret seed into such British sparks
 As those that spread a running fire in ling :
 Not Rome but Britain shall be strong by them.
 It will be so : but what is that to me ?
 To-night my sinking helpless country lies
 In the cold ruins of its shrunken past,
 As in the trembling arms and shrivelled breast
 Of an old failing man a little child
 Lies ignorantly and blindly feels for dugs
 That do not nourish it.
 The little child, restless within my breast,
 I cannot nourish yet or much protect ;
 I am a houseless wifeless aged man ;
 When men must save themselves I can do little ;

THE POETIC DRAMA

I can but sit, although the child may die,
And wait for pity and help, and if it weeps
Whimper with it amid this night of woe
For Britain that is like a friendless child.

The stark barrenness here is symbolic of Dr Bottomley's skill in dealing with primitive nature. His early Britons are not merely types of to-day speaking in verse; they are given an individuality of their own—a greater brutality, a sterner indomitability of purpose, and at the same time a greater simplicity. By granting them these Dr Bottomley has succeeded in doing what few have done—creating the atmosphere of an earlier time and another race.

A definitely lyrical tendency is visible in all these dramas, and it is this lyrical quality, more fully expressed, which gives significance to Dr Bottomley's recent series of choral plays. It might be said of these that while Abercrombie has striven to adapt verse to modern colloquial speech, Dr Bottomley aims at removing verse dialogue a stage farther by departing entirely from realistic conventions. His purpose may be adequately interpreted from some privately written explanations of his own. After writing Gruach, he declares, he "began to notice that the time is over for fitting a stylized speech (verse) to a naturalistic action that would fit a prose play equally well." "In the meantime," he continues,

I discovered that I love listening to poetry more than reading it. Then that the movement and colour of clothes and the incidence of light could, through my eyes, put my mind into a more efficient condition for listening to it. . . . As I see the theatre, every subject can be treated at two levels: (1) on the level of every day intercourse and colloquial speech, and (2) by making humanity vocal where it is unvocal, by making the stage a place where speech has become complete (regardless of external fact) and makes audible the grace of the soul, its grace of movement as well as of utterance.

Now, in the modern theatre, Dr Bottomley found that audiences trained or willing to accept these forms were few, and that the actors, being used to naturalistic methods, failed to give expression to the poetic language. It is in the work of the amateurs that he sees a new hope for this dramatic form ; there he has a body of interpreters who may be led to express adequately the tones of poetic diction.

Insensibly I concentrated on something in which speech has as large a share as possible : then on narrative poetry, for which the Greeks found a valid place in drama : then on variety of verse-structure, which led me to see there is a place for lyric verse too.

“ Look at any of the Greek masterpieces,” he writes, from the Agamemnon to the Hippolytus and you will see all those men knew that a narrative element is a necessary factor in poetry's existing upon the stage. Our Jacobean neglected or undervalued it, with fatal results : but Shakespeare knew that it was better to tell of Ophelia drowning herself than to show her doing it. (The Japanese of his time, though, knew still more : they knew they could successfully show her in symbol drowning herself, when they could not realistically). . . . These considerations led me to attempt a new synthesis. It has two attractions for me : (a) it predicates an unrealistic treatment of the chosen theme—which seems to be reasonable, as verse is not a realistic form of speech and is not very comfortable in a realistic action—and, when realism is once abandoned, a delightful freedom in the choice of subject dawns for one : and (b) it frees performance from much of the modern theatre's expensive equipment.

Thus have grown the later choral dramas which, although they are not intended for the ordinary commercial theatre, may, when taken into consideration with what has been said above concerning the significance of the British Drama League, the Scottish Community Drama Association, and the Unity Theatre, indicate a line of development for the poetic play which has hitherto remained unexplored. In any case, Dr Bottomley's recent works, of which perhaps Culbin Sands, Towie Castle, and Ardvorlich's Wife are most memorable, quite apart from their own lyrical beauties, are being instrumental in indicating to modern audiences the possibilities of a non-realistic approach and in training both speakers and auditors to appreciate the value of melodic utterance. At present they remain outside the walls of the regular playhouses (only in the Cambridge Festival Theatre under Mr Terence Gray was there to be discovered a conscious endeavour to exploit such dramatic forms), but their influence, indirectly at least, may be not the less profound, while the fact that Dr Bottomley has turned in his latest drama, Kate Kennedy (1945), from serious themes to a comic situation may have the effect of rendering this influence stronger still.

THE POETIC DRAMA

Dr Bottomley and Abercrombie were pioneers in this field ; later, in the thirties, came a still further movement forward. In America Mr Archibald MacLeish in Panic (1935) and Mr Maxwell Anderson, with his Winterset (1935) and High Tor (1936), made distinct and important contributions to the creation of a new poetic theatre, and almost at the same time Mr T. S. Eliot, Mr W. H. Auden, and Miss Dorothy L. Sayers indicated fresh possibilities for the future. Mr Eliot's Murder in the Cathedral (1935) forms a distinct milestone in the journey toward the resuscitation of a modern poetic drama, since here an author regarded by many of the younger generation as their chief master turned to the theatre and sought to apply his characteristic style to its purposes. The emotional power exhibited in this play gave assurance to those who had been pleading for the application of poetry to the stage, and convinced those who had hitherto doubted of the possibility of finding a dramatic speech based on the prevailing qualities found in modern verse. In Family Reunion (1939), despite the beauty of the dialogue and the effectiveness of many scenes, Mr Eliot has not been so successful, largely perhaps because the securing of the tragic mood through the treatment of a contemporary theme seems to be an impossibility. Tragedy, it would appear, demands distancing in time or place, and this modern version of ancient myth fails to capture the rich quality of the Becket story. Even so, Mr Eliot's achievement in demonstrating that poetic dialogue of high distinction and modernity could be used to express dramatic concepts in a way likely to attract popular audiences may mean much when the poets turn, now that peace has come, to carry on the work of the thirties.

An even more determined effort to base a new poetic drama on a reconciliation of current colloquial speech and of the tones assumed by modern non-dramatic poetry has been made by Mr W. H. Auden, in collaboration with Mr

Christopher Isherwood. Their joint The Dog beneath the Skin appeared in 1935, and was followed by The Ascent of F6 in 1936, and by a 'melodrama,' On the Frontier, in 1938. Of their value no one doubts, yet the strange paradox is to be noted that the more these two authors have tried to incorporate the colloquial in their work the less popular has their dramatic work become. Mr Auden has indicated many lines of possible development in the years to come ; but it must be confessed that so far he has not been able to devise a dramatic speech form at once directly appealing and emotionally profound, to reach that clarity of concept out of which alone theatrical greatness can spring.

Less distinctive in poetic form, but showing greater theatrical skill, are Miss Sayers' The Zeal of Thy House (1937) and The Devil to Pay (1939), in which Mr Eliot's experiment in dealing with religious subject-matter has been carried somewhat further. Less important is Stephen Spender's Trial of a Judge (1938), which, despite its brilliance in execution, exhibits a burning emotion so consuming as to destroy that simple structure from which a stage play must be built.

As with other things, the War sharply interrupted this interesting development, but there would seem to be hope that experimentation in dramatic poetry will be resumed. Whereas the conditions necessary for the flourishing of the comedy of manners have to a large extent disappeared, it may be prophesied that the impact of war will make audiences ready to welcome what can be produced in the theatre only by the use of poetry, and will make younger authors anxious to see whether their larger concepts may not most effectively be expressed in terms of the stage, with verse boldly spoken and not merely coldly read. It is certainly noteworthy that the War had barely ended when, in August 1945, Mr Martin Browne opened the Mercury Theatre as a 'Poet's Playhouse,' while at the same time appeared Mr Peter Yates' The Assassin, a drama which, despite the fact that the insanity of its hero takes from its tragic possibilities, is not only distinctive in expression, but offers such dramatic suggestions as indicate that there is still much in this field to be explored.

CHAPTER VI

THE 'EXPRESSIONISTIC' SCHOOL

IN the opinion of many prose still seems in general more aptly fitted to convey, in the regular public theatres, such thoughts and emotions as the dramatists have to give. At the same time, the reaction against purely realistic prose is widespread, and many attempts have been made to secure a medium based on the prose of ordinary speech, but more effective and raised to a higher plane. This the 'Expressionists' of Germany found in what might be called a selective and concentrated language. The characters in their plays were types, each representative of many men, and, just as there is the concentration of several persons in the one dramatic figure, so the authors endeavoured to concentrate in a few patterned phrases what might have had to be otherwise expressed in hundreds or thousands of words.

So far no one in England has quite succeeded in evolving a satisfactory medium of this kind. Translations of such plays as Gas and Masse-Mensch read and act strangely, a trifle uneasily. Somewhat in the German manner, although without the utilization of any fresh medium of expression, is Mr C. K. Munro's interesting play, The Rumour (1924). Here, in the short, significant scenes which appear to be adapted from the cinema technique, the author has told the story of modern international jealousies and the origin of war. This undoubtedly is a really significant play, but unhappily Mr Munro has not fulfilled the promise of this any more than he has fulfilled the promise of At Mrs Beam's. Progress (1925) appears simply as an imitation of The Rumour without the vital force which gives such distinction to the earlier play.

By far the greatest achievement in what may for convenience be called the 'Continental' manner is the second act of Mr Sean O'Casey's The Silver Tassie (1929), a play which, despite the mixture of styles, may be regarded in the future as perhaps the most powerful tragic drama of our time. Mr O'Casey's first works were cast in the realistic mould as modified by earlier Irish writers. Quite clearly he was intent on doing for the poor in Dublin what Synge had done for the peasantry, and in Juno and the Paycock (1925) and The Shadow of a Gunman (1927) he produced two brilliantly bitter studies of Irish life. These at once marked him out as among the most gifted of latter-day playwrights. Both plays were far surpassed by The Silver Tassie, which, with its sweep from laughter to tragedy, proved the breadth and power of his genius. The Silver Tassie has been criticized because it combined two methods—the naturalistic and the expressionistic—but the skill with which Mr O'Casey has allowed the one to drift into the other ought to have silenced such judgments. Nothing greater or finer in the modern theatre has been done than the majestically bitter chants at the altar of the gun or the restless, agitated movement of the third act of this play. The Silver Tassie is, without question, one of the truly arresting plays of our generation, although unfortunately its promise has not been paralleled, despite their rich flow of language, in his later dramas.

Entirely different in character, yet linked to it by its theme, stands Reginald Berkeley's The White Château (1927). The method adopted here is similar to that of Mr Munro's The Rumour, with the addition of verse links akin to those utilized by Drinkwater in Abraham Lincoln. Its passion is not so intense or its bitterness so acute as the passion and the bitterness of The Silver Tassie, but it too has power, dignity, and distinction. Among Berkeley's other works may be mentioned the brilliantly incisive wireless play called The Quest of Elizabeth (1926), in which naturalism and fancy are mingled with a sure and exquisite touch. The child's dream-world, the floating dreams of the fettered spirit, is united to the conversation in the hospital ward delicately and with masterly precision. Berkeley veers in Eight o'Clock (1920 ; 1926) and Mango Island (1926) to pure realism, but in The World's End (1926) he again unites the two styles, less satisfactorily than in The White Château.

THE 'EXPRESSIONISTIC' SCHOOL

The World's End displays him as a follower of Sir James Barrie and Lord Dunsany. The idea of this play is that there is an inn, "The World's End," in which has gathered a party of people, all dissatisfied with their positions. A Thibetan scholar suddenly makes an appearance, and under his influence one of the group, named Imogen, wishes that their desires may be fulfilled. There is a sudden flash of lightning and darkness descends. The following act shows each granted his secret longing, and each once more dissatisfied. In a moment of anger Imogen reverses her wish and they are cast back into their old spheres. Less successful, but none the less interesting, is Machines (1927), a clever attempt to adopt a modern subject to the requirements of the microphone, while in The Lady with a Lamp (1929) he has won popular success with a realistic treatment of an historical theme.

Experimentation on similar lines has been carried out by Mr H. F. Rubinstein, whose The House (1926) deals, like The White Château, with a building conceived of as possessing a vital entity and power. Perhaps the greatest weakness of this play lies in the fact that a theme akin to those that informed the old problem dramas has been dealt with in a style distinctly 'modern,' and that consequently there is a disharmony between the subject and its treatment. Mr Rubinstein, however, is an interesting pioneer, and in this play, as well as in Isabel's Eleven (1927), he is obviously endeavouring to express something new in dramatic form.

Most of such English experiments in the 'Continental' style have not attempted anything violently revolutionary; rather has the attempt been made so to adapt the familiar naturalistic method as to make it in some measure accord with the newer tendencies. In the majority of those efforts which consciously and deliberately aim at the utilization of more modern dramatic devices, too, it may be noted that there is a certain atmosphere of stiffness and artificiality, as though the fresh garments sat rather uncomfortably on shoulders accustomed to older modes. A typical example of this may be found in W. J. Turner's The Man who ate the Popomack (1922). In his preface Turner defended the 'construction' of the play, declaring that he had aimed at something new, something which could not be assessed by ordinary 'academic' standards. Novelty in form, however, can never be justified merely as novelty; if it is to have justification that must come from the success with which the new form expresses the theme of the play. In The Man who ate the Popomack there is, first, a disastrous mingling of purely farcical and would-be tragic moods; one man who eats of the evil-smelling fruit ensconces himself in a diver's suit, while the other, in his isolation amid life, commits suicide. Secondly, there is a utilization of two entirely distinct dramatic conventions in such a manner as inevitably to cause confusion in the mind of the audience. In one a picture is given of events which actually happened years before; in the other a picture is presented of events which might have happened, but did not in reality occur. There seems, in other words, a mingling of diverse elements, merely for the sake of novelty and not because of any inherent necessity, of diverse experimental moods and styles. Perhaps one might criticize similarly Mr Hermon Ould's The Dance of Life (1924). Here certainly is something infinitely more harmonious and artistically conceived, something that more definitely approaches what certain Continental playwrights have been aiming at. The main weakness lies not in a confusion of moods and conventions, but in the lack of a philosophic convention large enough to warrant the treatment. When closely analysed the theme itself is seen not to possess that significance or grandeur which we are led, from the method of treatment, to expect. Miss Velona Pilcher's The Searcher (1930) fails likewise through lack of sufficient basic strength.

What will develop out of these endeavours cannot possibly be prophesied; all that may be said is that so far, save for one play by Mr Carroll and one play by Mr O'Casey, these forms of expression have not succeeded in giving very much of permanent value to the English theatre, and that, apart from a few experiments by Sir Barry Jackson, Mr Terence Gray, and Mr Peter Godfrey, the English playhouses have in general fought shy of such newer 'Continental' styles.

Nor has much of intrinsic worth arisen out of attempts by English dramatists to work in the 'impressionistic' or subjective style. Most notable here is the series of dramas contributed to the theatre during the late thirties by Mr J. B. Priestley. Starting as novelist and essayist, Mr Priestley first used the stage for the pursuit of themes, handled with skill, but possessing no peculiar quality—Dangerous Corner (1932) and Laburnum Grove (1933). With Time and the Conways (1937), however, followed by I Have Been Here Before (1937) and Music at Night (1938), a new note enters in. Strongly influenced by the philosopher Dunne, Mr Priestley here tries to find dramatic expression for space-time concepts and for subtler studies of subjective emotion than the realistic plays commonly admit. Clever as these essays are, they must yet be deemed hardly likely to lead the English stage toward fresh vistas. The theatre is a strangely restricted form of artistry, and such things as Mr Priestley endeavours to expound in terms of plot and character seem, in general, outside its range. Music at Night may be welcomed as a novelty, but there seems little possibility of its becoming a classic of the stage. Perhaps because he is conscious of his inability to make more of this form, Mr Priestley has, during the War, turned to other styles, in the imaginative They Came to a City (1943) and Desert Highway (1944), and in the amusingly satiric How Are They At Home? (1944). Like Mr Priestley's impressionistic plays, Mr Charles Morgan's The Flashing Stream (1938) seems too deeply concerned with the attainment of subjective truth to realize objective strength. A closer approximation toward success in this way is to be found in Mr Paul Vincent Carroll's sensitive and deeply emotional Shadow and Substance (1937), which, although it hardly belongs to the impressionistic school, challenges attention here for its attempt to portray dramatically the concatenation of the real and imaginary worlds.

THE 'EXPRESSIONISTIC' SCHOOL

CHAPTER VII

PLAYS HISTORICAL AND IMAGINATIVE

PERHAPS the most hopeful and promising of all movements in the English stage of to-day is the rapid development of the historical play. That the exploitation of historical themes is not merely the result of chance or of imitation seems proved by many things ; the more it is studied the more it assumes shape as a deliberate endeavour to escape from the trammels of naturalism and to bring back something of poetic expression to the theatre. Mr Clifford Bax has put the position clearly :

The historical dramatist stands, in relation to the playwright of modern life, somewhat as a portrait-painter does in relation to a photograph. He gives—or tries to give—the essentials of human emotion and experience : not an exact rendering of somebody's actual speech but an impression of what that somebody is feeling.

This judgment may be over-severe on the naturalists of the past generation, and it may also be partly negatived by a consideration of the higher realism achieved by such men as Ibsen and Tchechov, but in essentials it gives perfectly just expression to the idea behind this ' historical ' movement. Here is the opportunity for introducing something of poetry :

The figures in a costume-play can be a little larger than life : that is to say that, without offending our sense of reality, they can express themselves a little more richly than figures which are photographed, as exactly as possible from the life which we see around us.

The mood and the diction of poetry may thus be introduced as these could not be introduced into a ' repertory ' play of 1910.

The historical theme was not, of course, entirely absent in the first decades of the nineteenth century, but during that period such dramas were undoubtedly exceptions merely.

PLAYS HISTORICAL AND IMAGINATIVE

Mr Shaw, always individual, wrote of Cæsar and Napoleon ; but, apart from his work and that of the purely poetic school, it is hard to name any distinctive plays of this kind apart from the interesting Irish dramas of Lady Gregory and Mr Lennox Robinson. As a definite movement in the theatre the historical play does not assume importance till about the year 1920. Its significance may be gauged by the fact that many of the elder writers have turned, during recent years, to experiment in this form. Mr Shaw in 1923 produced his Saint Joan, the success of which indicated the willingness of the public to welcome the costume drama. Mr St John Ervine followed with an exceedingly interesting variant wherein, instead of actual historical persons, the characters of one of Shakespeare's comedies are chosen as dramatis personæ. The Lady of Belmont (1924) attempts in a way to do the exact opposite of what Dr Bottomley had done in Gruach and King Lear's Wife. Here, instead of providing a prologue, Mr Ervine has provided an epilogue. His criticism of The Merchant of Venice is no less penetrating and significant than was Dr Bottomley's of Lear. He has assessed the Shakespearian characters at their true value, and, carrying them beyond the stage at which they had been left, shows with remorseless logic what they were fated by their natures to become. In this play, as in his earlier domestic dramas and in his later comedy, Mr Ervine demonstrates his fine dramatic sense and his mastery of different styles. The costume comedies of J. B. Fagan and Miss Dane's Will Shakespeare have been noted earlier, as well as the poetic dramas on historical themes of Mr Masefield.

The close association between the poetic school and this historical school is well exemplified by John Drinkwater and by Mr Clifford Bax. Both are writers of verse, and both, as it were, moved from the utilization of verse as a dramatic medium to the employment of a prose richer than that allowed in ordinary naturalistic drama. Drinkwater's earlier poetic plays have been considered above : none of these won great success, but when, in 1918, he produced Abraham Lincoln he achieved something which almost immediately brought him to international fame. That play was followed by several other historical dramas—Mary Stuart (1921 ; revised 1922), Oliver Cromwell (1922), and Robert E. Lee (1923). With these the chronicle history seemed to be revived again. The multiplicity of individually delineated characters dominated by the one master-figure seems a conception borrowed from Elizabethan days. Yet Abraham Lincoln and the other kindred dramas are not mere chronicle plays. In essence they are plays of ideas. If $X = 0$ is an almost bitter attack upon war, Abraham Lincoln shows the high-souled effort to achieve freedom even by the means of that which Lincoln in his soul abhorred, the cruel agony of battle. War for him is not a thing of hate. It is to be pursued resolutely, but not vindictively, and its end is not the crushing of the enemy, but the raising of a new understanding born out of the turmoil of the conflict. Oliver Cromwell and Robert E. Lee likewise subordinate the presentation of history to a formal problem, and in Mary Stuart we have a subtle study of a more social question, that of woman's, or of a woman's soul. For Drinkwater there are some women who have hearts so wide, who have ideals so high, that they cannot find any one man great enough to satisfy their soul's love. In the Induction a young husband is telling with grief to an elderly and world-wise friend how his wife, although she seems to love him, pours out love to another as well. As they are speaking together the modern scene fades away, and we are in the presence of the unhappy Mary Queen of Scots. She is one of these women. Darnley and Bothwell and Rizzio are merely portions of that larger whole for which she craves. She desires strength and beauty and passion ; perhaps she finds one of these qualities in one of her lovers, another in another, but never has she discovered all in one man. She is not fickle and faithless ; it is simply that her ideal is too high for human attainment.

In this last play Drinkwater employs something of the supernatural atmosphere which is coming to take such a hold of the modern theatre, but in doing so he has succeeded in creating a novel form for the expression of those many problems which face us in life and which are continually clamouring for our attention. This, probably, is his subtlest drama.

PLAYS HISTORICAL AND IMAGINATIVE

CLIFFORD BAX AND JAMES BRIDIE

Mr Bax's work in the drama is no less significant. He is ever seeking after style, and that style, he finds, may best be achieved through the writing of the costume play. His dramatic productions are, as is well known, diverse, extending from such an essay, written in almost a naturalistic manner, as Up Stream (1922; acted 1925), or such graceful verse sketches as are included in Polite Satires (1922), or such pieces of entertaining fantasy as Midsummer Madness (1923; produced 1924), a commedia dell' arte theme in prose and aria, Nocturne in Palermo (1924), in rimed verse and aria, and Old King Cole (1921), or such 'ballad operas' as Mr Pepys (1926), to the later Socrates (1930), The Venetian (1931), The Immortal Lady (1931), and The Rose without a Thorn (1931; produced 1932); it is among the last-mentioned plays, however, that his dramatic power has found expression least fettered and most gracious. Socrates may be too motionless in physical action for the ordinary theatre, but its delicately appreciative treatment of the Socratic method and its clearly conceived characters mark it out as one of the most notable of modern plays. Socrates, following the Platonic dialogues, is philosophically and chastely poetic; The Venetian is essentially lyrical, and so stands, as it were, at the opposite extreme. Between these two comes The Rose without a Thorn, which, from the point of view of the present-day theatre and audience, is probably Mr Bax's most successful play. Here both the lyrical movements of The Venetian and the philosophically contemplative tendencies of Socrates are avoided, and the author has set himself to develop characters within a pattern, based on historic fact, but shaped by his imagination. Maybe a certain loss of significant stress is felt when Mr Bax makes Henry break down in tears at the preliminary trial scene, so that his last solitary cry at the end lacks some of its effectiveness, but, taken as a whole, this play too is assuredly one of the most important and beautifully constructed historical dramas of our time. Reading or seeing these plays, one realizes that Mr Bax is of the dramatists of this generation whose plays will live. His effective treatment of character, his skilful wielding of material, and his delicate sense of style give prime distinction to his work.

Besides Drinkwater and Mr Bax, several other playwrights have aimed at this reintroduction of 'style' in the theatre, chiefly by the cultivation of historical themes. Among these Mr Ashley Dukes immediately claims attention. His most popular play, the well-known The Man with a Load of Mischief (1924), is not, of course, 'historical,' but that word is here used to include costume plays of any kind and is not restricted merely to dramas in which historical figures are the chief characters. The thing that attracts us at once to The Man with a Load of Mischief is the delicately polished and jewelled prose used for the dialogue. The story is a slight one, but the play achieves distinction because of its style. Similar tendencies are to be discovered in Mr Dukes' more recently published volume, Five Plays of Other Times (1931). Of these The Fountain Head (1928), with its invented theme, most nearly approaches The Man with a Load of Mischief, but what is possibly the finest drama in this collection, Tyl Ulenspiegel (performed at Brussels in a translation by Émile Cammaerts, 1927), turns for subject-matter to historic fact. It is interesting to notice that here Mr Dukes has employed the episodic method, with a number of short, significant scenes rather than longer acts. His later work, such as the Mandragola of 1939, has mostly been confined to translation.

Of recent years the greatest theatrical success among these historical plays has been secured by Rudolf Besier's The Barretts of Wimpole Street (1930), which, after a successful première at the Malvern Festival, ran for nearly a year and a half in London. This drama too aims at a richer style than the naturalistic method can permit, and adds to the poetic atmosphere by taking as its chief figures Robert Browning and his wife. Partly its theatrical triumph was due to the distinguished acting of Sir Cedric Hardwicke as Barrett, Mr Scott Sunderland as Browning, and Miss Gwen Ffranccon-Davies as Elizabeth, but, even with less imaginative interpretation, it would have proved popular, for Besier, very skilfully indeed, has here built up what might be regarded as a literary melodrama. The melodrama, with its villain, hero, and heroine, had seized upon certain essentially appealing dramatic types and situations; its popularity was based on that. In Besier's study of poetic passion and strange perverted instinct the plot develops in melodramatic form, with frail heroine in villain's power and noble hero prepared to overcome all obstacles in order to win her love. This statement is not intended to imply any adverse criticism of Besier's drama; rather is it designed to show how much more effective and strong are the imaginative dramatists of to-day than were the Tennysons of the past. In the theatre the elements of popular appeal may not be neglected, and Besier's work might be taken as symbolic of the modern re-wedding of popular situation (melodrama) and imaginative literary force: out of such a union rose, too, the drama of the Elizabethan period.

PLAYS HISTORICAL AND IMAGINATIVE

While all his work does not belong to this kind, Mr James Bridie challenges attention here. The Scots school of playwrights did not produce, in the first decades of this century, such a masterly array of dramas as Ireland had done. Sir James Barrie, of course, is Scots, but his better plays are not specifically local, and his sentimentalism, although allied to a kind of sentimentalism once popular in the North, is a thing personal to himself. Recent interest in the theatre, however, has contributed toward the development of a distinctive Scots drama, some of which never reaches the London theatres. Many of the plays so far produced there have been of the naturalistic style, and still realism keeps its grip, as is exemplified in the works of Mr J. Corrie. On the other hand, Dr Gordon Bottomley had early shown the possibilities of a poetic treatment of Scots history; Mr J. A. Ferguson wrote a finely effective Scots historical drama in Campbell of Kilmhor (1915), as well as other pieces set in the historical past—for example, The King of Morven (1922); and Mr John Brandane in The Glen is Mine (1923; printed 1925) and The Lifting (1925) suggested still further possibilities in subject and treatment. During the late twenties and thirties, partly owing to the activities of the Scottish Community Drama Association and the Scottish National Theatre Society, there were several experiments on these lines, but so far only one dramatist has succeeded in reaching beyond the local and achieving general appeal. Mr James Bridie does not, it is true, always deal with specifically Scots subject-matter, but a great deal of his strength, like the strength of Synge and Mr O'Casey, comes from his knowledge and appreciation of national types. It were impossible here to survey the entirety of his numerous works, but some few may be chosen for representative treatment. The Anatomist (1931) and Tobias and the Angel (1931), because of their London productions by Mr Anmer Hall, established his reputation. Both exhibit characteristic qualities. Mr Bridie's strength lies in his versatility. He can depict with a sureness of touch the degrading atmosphere of the low Edinburgh tavern, and he can play charmingly with whimsical comedy. He possesses, too, a great sense of dramatic contrast—the contrast of the cynically blunt Dr Knox and the prim denizens of a respectable drawing-room, the contrast of timid little Tobias and the archangel disguised as a porter. These things give strength and forcefulness to the two plays. Where, so far, Mr Bridie fails is in what may be styled dramatic architecture. Only too frequently his concluding acts do not do justice to the brilliance of those preceding them, while a peculiarly effective scene is often marred by its juxtaposition with one of less intensity or stylistic skill. The magnificent tavern scene in The Anatomist is spoilt by the drawing-room act that follows; the beauty of the archangel's talk with Tobias' wife is partly lost by the conversation that ensues.

In The Switchback (1930) a brilliant first act fails to find succeeding episodes equally novel and vitally delineated; the inconclusive ending of his King of Nowhere (1938) weakens a drama strongly based on a series of theatrically powerful characterizations; the expectancies raised by the truly magnificent first act of The Last Trump (1938) are not satisfied. One sometimes has the impression that Mr

PLAYS HISTORICAL AND IMAGINATIVE

Bridie's mind is so vigorous, so prolific in ideas, so stocked with characters of the imagination, that he does not permit himself time to complete an original concept: a brilliant thought, before it can be fully expressed, is followed by another even more brilliant, and its creator hurriedly sets out after the new star. Nevertheless Mr Bridie possesses, to a supreme degree, the genuine dramatic instinct, and not a single one of his plays is without interest. He displays, too, a growing power and an ever-widening vision. From such a study of the evils wrought by success as is presented in his 'quiet farce' Babes in the Wood (1938) he passes to adroit treatment of a Biblical theme in Susannah and the Elders (1940), from that to the incorporation of the Esther story in a Scots university setting, from that to the exquisitely fantastic experiment in the supernatural, Mr Bolfry (1943), from that to a re-evaluation of Arthurian legend in Lancelot (1944), and so on to a joyous impish effort to revive the ballad opera form in The Forrigan Reel (1945). Next to Mr Shaw Mr Bridie stands as the most fecund, and the greatest, of all living British playwrights.

Many other plays written on themes of the past have been produced during the last ten or fifteen years. Mr Shane Leslie takes the seventeen-eighties as his period in The Delightful, Diverting, and Devotional Play of Mrs Fitzherbert (1928), in which, however, the dialogue seems unsatisfactory by reason of a certain tone of artificiality. In Charles and Mary (1930) Miss Joan Temple not ineffectively deals with Lamb and his sister. The period of Henri IV is taken by Conal O'Riordan (Norreys Connell) in his cleverly handled His Majesty's Pleasure, which, originally contributed to The Irish Review in 1912, was published in revised and expanded form in 1925. For the theme of Krishna Kumari (1924) Mr Edward Thompson turns to the East, writing of India in 1806. This is an exceedingly interesting drama, but fails because of too great dependence upon historical notes, the deferring of Krishna's introduction till the third act, and the weakness in the character of Bhim Singh. English history for the most part interests Mr Howard Peacey. Mr Peacey clearly has a skill in the devising of situation, together with a neat and effective style in dialogue ; unfortunately, his larger conception of the themes he has chosen wants precision and firmness. Of this Warren Hastings (1928) provides a good example. Up to a point our interest is aroused and kept intent on the characters ; the strife of Hastings and Philip Francis, the love between the former and Baroness Imhoff, and the personality of Sir Elijah Impey, Hastings' elephantine friend, all are treated in a manner at once vital and arresting. The weakness of the play rests in the fact that the central theme is dealt with somewhat lifelessly and without stronger vision. The sentimental talk concerning the union of India under British control seems wholly out of character. The same weakness is traceable in El Dorado (1925), which is confusing through want of definite orientation, and in The Fifth of November (1924), where the action is lost in a multiplicity of characters and where the characters themselves are conceived in a sentimental light. In these plays Mr Peacey seems hardly to have got above the historical facts with which he deals ; perhaps the "Tables of Events" which he appends to Warren Hastings and to The Fifth of November are symbolic. On the other hand, his writing has distinction, and there is much of promise in his work.

Perhaps here might be considered, too, such a play as Mr G. D. Gribble's The Masque of Venice (1924), which, although not historical, is sufficiently removed from the ordinary life around us to partake of the impression which it is the aim of the historical dramatists to produce. While The Masque of Venice contains some good scenes, a lack of harmony seriously militates against its worth. The characters of Egeria and Mumford want definite features, and that of Sophia Weir, the "literary Celebrity," is strained and ineffective. Mr Gribble seems to have fallen here between the stools of satire (shown in the portrait of Joshua Cox) and of serious intent. A strange experiment has been made by Mr Sutton Vane in Outward Bound (1923). Once more in this play the characters are presented as though they belonged to everyday life, although it gradually becomes clear that they live no longer among us. The first act of Outward Bound contains what is possibly the finest surprise scene in modern drama ; the way in which the discovery is made to the audience that the liner is a liner of the dead is handled in a skilful manner. Often surprises of this kind destroy the effect of the plays in which they are introduced ; Mr Vane's technical brilliance is shown by his ability to keep our interest alive in his characters throughout the drama. Somewhat similar to Outward Bound is Mr Laurence Housman's Possession (1921), " A Peep-show in Paradise," where a kindred surprise is sprung upon the audience. Mr Housman's faintly cynical sentimentalism and subacid humour serve him well here, as they do in his companion studies of Victorian life published as Angels and Ministers (1921)—notably in The Queen : God Bless Her ! and The Comforter. Known among amateurs for his charming series of Little Plays of St Francis (1922), Mr Housman won considerable commercial success with his Victoria Regina (1935). More recently Mr Norman Ginsbury has carried on the tradition with his Viceroy Sarah (1935) and The First Gentleman (1945).

PLAYS HISTORICAL AND IMAGINATIVE

In such ways has drama been moving during the last few years. Obviously we are at present in a stage of transition and hardly have made up our minds as to where precisely we stand. The old naturalistic method can still make an appeal when it is handled strongly by a Van Druten ; the spectacular show wins many a success ; the newer experiments in non-realistic and non-spectacular drama quite clearly excite, too, an interest among at least certain sections of the community. Things have been moving rapidly in the dramatic world ; fresh technical methods have been required for the silent film, for the ' talkie,' and for the wireless play. So far, perhaps, we have not adapted ourselves fully to the changed conditions, and hesitate, sometimes bewildered, amid conflicting ideals—between the appeal to the eye, derived from the example of the film, and the appeal to the ear, derived from the example of the radio ; between the literary tradition of the Shavian stage direction and the stage direction, almost non-existent, of the broadcast drama ; between the rational desire to find in the theatre a reflection of current life, a treatment of daily problems, and a longing to escape into a more imaginative realm where the present is forgotten in the images either of the historical past or of a fanciful invention.

BRITISH DRAMA

Whatever confusion there may be, however, and whatever failure may occur, it is certain that that 'renascence of English Drama' heralded in the nineties of the last century has not lost its vital force. An age becomes weak dramatically when all it can think of is imitation of past models; the remarkable development of the imaginative play in recent years and the no less remarkable experimentation in novel forms of expression, demonstrate the keenly flowing life force which courses through the theatre of to-day. That life force has been stimulated considerably by the art of the cinema and the art of the wireless play, so that what at first seemed, and to many still seems, to threaten the success of the regular theatre may perhaps be regarded as the instrument by means of which the stage will grow in power, after its rude shattering during the War, to produce something even finer than the rich five decades from 1890 to 1940 have already given to us.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

I. NOTES ON CRITICAL WORKS

THE following list of books is necessarily selective. It is intended merely as a preliminary guide for students who may wish to devote special attention to one particular period, and must be supplemented by reference to more exhaustive bibliographies contained in most of the volumes cited.

(i) PLAY-LISTS, BIBLIOGRAPHIES, AND GENERAL HISTORIES

There is no complete reference book for English drama. Up to 1812 the Biographia Dramatica of Isaac Reed and Stephen Jones, though long out-of-date, is useful; The 'Stage' Encyclopædia provides a handy brief list of plays; unfortunately W. Davenport Adams' Dictionary of the Drama was left incomplete at the letter G. The Cambridge Bibliography of English Literature gives fairly full lists up to the eighteenth century and selective lists thereafter, together with invaluable references to critical works. To these works should be added Alfred Harbage's Annals of English Drama, 975-1700 (1945). For plays produced from medieval times to the seventeenth century reference ought to be made to the volumes of Sir E. K. Chambers and W. W. Greg cited below; play-lists for the Restoration period are given by Montague Summers and also by the present writer, who has carried on the record by giving the titles and dates of production of all dramas between 1700 and 1900.

F. E. Schelling has a book on English Drama (1914), useful, but overstressing the Elizabethan period; shorter studies are those by Benjamin Brawley (1922), H. F. Rubinstein (1928), and Graham Greene (1942). A. H. Thorndike surveys the field of English Comedy (1929). The present writer has a short study, The English Theatre (1936).

(ii) THE MIDDLE AGES

On medieval drama the standard authority is Sir E. K. Chambers' The Mediæval Stage (1903), although to this should be added The Drama of the Medieval Church (1933), by Karl Young. A racy account of the plays is given in J. J. Jusserand's A Literary History of the English People (1907-9). The Ludus Coventriæ has been edited by K. S. Block (1922), the York plays by L. T. Smith (1885), the 'Towneley' by A. W. Pollard; others appear in the Early English Text Society series. Serviceable and well-edited specimens are printed in anthologies prepared by J. M. Manly (1900-3), A. W. Pollard (1923), and J. Q. Adams (1924). Many of the moralities and interludes are in the Malone Society series, that of the Early English Text Society, and the "Tudor Facsimile Texts," edited by J. S. Farmer.

BRITISH DRAMA

(iii) THE ELIZABETHAN PERIOD

For the drama up to 1616 Sir E. K. Chambers' The Elizabethan Stage (1923) is the prime authority: this work is being completed by G. E. Bentley in his Jacobean and Caroline Stage (of which two volumes have been published, 1941). W. W. Greg has a Bibliography of the English Printed Drama to the Restoration (vol. i, 1939). There exists a vast library of critical works on all aspects of the theatre during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries: references will be found in the Cambridge Bibliography of English Literature. Among earlier general studies may be mentioned F. E. Schelling's Elizabethan Drama (1908), Sir A. W. Ward's History of English Dramatic Literature (1899), C. M. Gayley's Plays of Our Forefathers (1908), J. J. Jusserand's A Literary History of the English People (1907-9), J. A. Symonds' Shakespeare's Predecessors in the English Drama (1900), and F. S. Boas' Shakspeare and his Predecessors (1896). Janet Spens has a suggestive essay on Elizabethan Drama (1922).

On the early period—the 'Tudor' drama—there are studies by F. S. Boas (1933), A. W. Reed (1926), and C. F. Tucker Brooke (1911). Of recent years a fair amount of attention has been paid to the later plays: mention may be made of F. S. Boas' An Introduction to Stuart Drama (1946), U. M. Ellis-Fermor's The Jacobean Drama (1936), H. W. Wells' Elizabethan and Jacobean Playwrights (1939), and Alfred Harbage's Cavalier Drama (1936).

Most of the more important plays of the period have been reprinted, and their authors' lives studied. Facsimiles and type-facsimiles appear in the Malone Society and "Tudor Facsimile Texts" series; modernized texts are given in the "Mermaid" and "Belles Lettres" collections.

On the early tragic writers J. W. Cunliffe's The Influence of 500

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Seneca on Elizabethan Tragedy (1907), as well as the introduction to the works of Sir William Alexander (1922), edited by L. E. Kastner and H. B. Charlton, and F. L. Lucas' Seneca and Elizabethan Tragedy (1922), should be consulted. The contributions of George Gascoigne are examined by F. E. Schelling (1893) and C. T. Prouty (1943). John Haywood's work has been investigated by A. W. Reed, and there are numerous studies of the early moralities and interludes.

A new Marlowe, edited by various scholars, has recently appeared; the discoveries of J. L. Hotson (1925) are discussed in John Bakeless' The Tragical History of Christopher Marlowe (1943) and F. S. Boas' Christopher Marlowe (1940). Greene's works have been edited by J. C. Collins, Lyly's by R. W. Bond, Kyd's by F. S. Boas, Nashe's by R. B. McKerrow; less satisfactory are the editions of Peele by A. H. Bullen and of Lodge by Sir E. Gosse.

Jonson's works are receiving adequate attention in the great edition prepared by C. H. Herford and Percy Simpson. The studies by G. Gregory Smith and Castelain are valuable. In 1922 was published a Jonson Allusion Book, edited by J. Q. Adams and J. F. Bradley: this is materially supplemented in G. E. Bentley's Shakespeare and Jonson (1945). Note should be taken of Mina Kerr's Influence of Ben Jonson on English Comedy (1912) and R. G. Noyes' Ben Jonson on the English Stage (1935). Harold Jenkins deals well with The Life and Work of Henry Chettle (1934); but Dekker has been rather neglected. Chapman's works have been studied and edited by T. M. Parrott (1910-14). A modern edition of Middleton is to be desired: the latest is that of A. H. Bullen (1885-86). The same is true of Massinger, although a useful critical study has been published by A. Cruickshank (1920); a more recent work is Baldwin Maxwell's Studies in Beaumont, Fletcher and Massinger (1940). The best edition of Beaumont and Fletcher's plays is that edited by A. L. Waller and A. Glover (1905).

Marston's works have recently been edited by H. Harvey Wood (1934), Tourneur's by the present writer (1930), and Webster's by F. L. Lucas (1929). M. J. Sargeaunt's study of John Ford (1935) has met a long-standing need. There is a good study of Shirley by A. H. Nason (1915), but the Gifford and Dyce edition of his plays is long out-of-date. A new edition of Thomas Heywood is greatly to be desired: Otelia Cromwell has an essay surveying the general course of his career. E. K. R. Faust's

BRITISH DRAMA

Richard Brome (1887) is useful, but requires supplementing. On D'Avenant there are detailed recent studies by A. H. Nethercot (1938) and Alfred Harbage (1935); the latter also has a work on Thomas Killigrew (1930).

The University drama has been adequately treated by F. S. Boas (1914) and G. C. Moore Smith (1923).

The masque has received a good deal of attention during recent years. A. Reyher's Les masques anglais (1909) is still a standard work, but Enid Welsford's The Court Masque (1927) provides fresh material and more adequate critical judgments. The present writer surveys the staging in Stuart Masques and the Renaissance Stage (1937). The Walpole and Malone Societies issued an important volume of Inigo Jones' designs (1924).

On the Elizabethan theatre an important recent book is John C. Adam's The Globe Playhouse (1942). The most exhaustive account is that of Sir E. K. Chambers, but earlier volumes on the subject still hold their interest—notably J. Q. Adams' Shakespearean Playhouses (1917) and A. H. Thorndike's Shakespeare's Theatre (1916), as well as the various studies by G. F. Reynolds and W. J. Lawrence (the latest being Those Nut-cracking Elizabethans (1935)). Particularly significant studies are A. C. Sprague's Shakespeare and the Audience (1935), and Alfred Harbage's Shakespeare's Audience (1942). A. Feuillerat's Documents relating to the Office of the Revels at Court (1908, 1914), his Le bureau des menus-plaisirs et la mise en scène à la cour d'Elizabeth (1910), Tucker Murray's Elizabethan Dramatic Companies (1910) and J. Q. Adams' The Dramatic Records of Sir Harry Herbert (1918) reprint important documents bearing upon stage history. A valuable work is M. C. Bradbrooke's Themes and Conventions of Elizabethan Tragedy (1935), in which the plays are closely related to stage methods of the time.

(iv) SHAKESPEARE

The Shakespeare literature is vast, and only a few works can be mentioned here. Sir E. K. Chambers' William Shakespeare (1930) is a standard authority, but this presents rather a "study of facts and problems" than a biography; it is supplemented by the same author's Shakespearean Gleanings (1944) and his Sources for a Biography of Shakespeare (1946): a condensation of the material appears in A Short Life of Shakespeare (1933), abridged by Charles Williams. Sir Sidney Lee's Life is still valuable, although there are other recent biographies by J. Q.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Adams and others. J. Dover Wilson's The Essential Shakespeare (1932) is a suggestive study.

There is a useful Shakespeare Bibliography (1931) by Ebisch and Schücking. This will give reference to the abounding critical literature on the subject; among recent writings attention may be called to A Companion to Shakespearian Studies (1934), edited by H. Granville-Barker and G. B. Harrison, Theodore Spencer's Shakespeare and the Nature of Man (1943), E. M. W. Tillyard's The Elizabethan World Picture (1943), Mark Van Doren's Shakespeare (1941), J. Middleton Murry's Shakespeare (1936), Peter Alexander's Shakespeare's Life and Art (1939), H. B. Charlton's Shakespearian Comedy (1937), E. M. W. Tillyard's Shakespeare's Last Plays (1938) and Shakespeare's History Plays (1944), as well as to the exceedingly important Prefaces by Harley Granville-Barker, the various studies by J. Dover Wilson (notably What Happens in Hamlet, 1935, and The Fortunes of Falstaff, 1943), the writings of E. E. Stoll (e.g., Shakespeare and Other Masters, 1939, and Art and Artifice in Shakespeare, 1933), G. Wilson Knight (e.g., The Wheel of Fire, 1930), and those of W. W. Lawrence (Shakespeare's Problem Plays, 1931) and O. J. Campbell (Shakespeare's Satire, 1943).

These, of course, do not replace earlier criticism, which is well summarized in A. Ralli's A History of Shakespearian Criticism (1931). On the other hand, they make use of recent investigations into such subjects as Shakespearian imagery (Caroline F. Spurgeon, Shakespeare's Imagery, 1935; W. Clemen, Shakespeares Bilder, 1936; E. A. Armstrong, Shakespeare's Imagination, 1946) and bibliography.

The latter is an important subject. A good introduction is provided by A. W. Pollard's Shakespeare's Fight with the Pirates (1920), but much has been published on the question since this book appeared. For the non-specialist student the New Cambridge Shakespeare, edited by J. Dover Wilson, excellently indicates the use to which bibliographical evidence may be put.

A true investigation of the various problems can be undertaken only when reference is made direct to the original text. The First Folio has been reprinted by Sir Sidney Lee (1902), and there is another excellent facsimile issued by Methuen. The quarto texts are nearly all available in reprints. In the Furness Variorum edition an attempt is made to record the variants. Related to the bibliographical problems is that presented by the manuscript of Sir Thomas More, some portions of which may be in Shakespeare's writing ; on this see Shakespeare's Hand in " Sir Thomas More " (1923).

Questions concerning the authorship of the plays may be approached by a reading of essays by A. E. Morgan (on Henry V), by Dugdale Sykes (on The Taming of the Shrew), and by J. Parrott (on Timon). Reference must here be made to the "Shakespeare Apocrypha" and to the source material used in the plays. Useful volumes are C. F. Tucker Brooke's The Shakespeare Apocrypha (1908), Shakespeare's Library (re-edited by Hazlitt, 1875) and the Shakespeare Classics, issued under the general editorship of Sir Israel Gollancz.

The history of Shakespeare's plays on the English stage has been excellently told by G. C. D. Odell in his Shakespeare from Betterton to Irving (1922), by Hazelton Spencer in Shakespeare Improved (1927), and by A. C. Sprague in Shakespeare and the Actors (1944).

(v) RESTORATION

The drama of the later seventeenth century has been dealt with in the present writer's History of Restoration Drama (1925), and in Montague Summers' The Playhouse of Pepys (1935), A Bibliography of the Restoration Drama (1935), and The Restoration Theatre (1934). Very useful is A Check List of English Plays 1641-1700, compiled by G. L. Woodward and J. G. McManaway (1945). The English heroic play is the subject of a study by L. N. Chase, and the comedy of manners of another by C. Palmer (1910). Recently H. E. Rollins has contributed to various periodicals (e.g., Studies in Philology, 1921) valuable notes on drama in the Commonwealth period, and this is the subject of J. L. Hotson's Commonwealth and Restoration Stage (1928). A rare and entertaining contemporary work is John Downe's Roscius Anglicanus (1708). This, and Pepys' Diary, furnish a good deal of our information concerning the theatre at this time. Lily Campbell's Scenes and Machines in the Renaissance (1923), E. Thaler's Shakespeare to Sheridan (1922), R. W. Lowe's Betterton (1898), and J. W. Tupper's edition of two of D'Avenant's plays ("Belles Lettres" series, 1909) will be found useful. Beljame's Le public et les hommes de lettres au dix-huitième siècle (1898) is an important work, as are C. Perromat's study of Wycherley (1922), Bonamy Dobree's Restoration Comedy (1924) and Restoration Tragedy (1929), J. W. Krutch's Comedy and Conscience after the Restoration (1924), T. E. Perry's The Comic Spirit in Restoration Drama (1925), and

BIBLIOGRAPHY

K. M. Lynch's The Social Mode in Restoration Comedy (1926). D. H. Miles essays to survey The Influence of Molière on Restoration Comedy (1901). This might be read along with J. E. Gillet's Molière en Angleterre (1913) and A. de Mandach's Molière et la comédie de mœurs en Angleterre (1946). R. S. Forsythe's A Study of the Plays of Thomas D'Urfey (1916-17) contains some interesting material, as do J. W. Dodds' Thomas Southerne, Dramatist (1933), and R. N. Cunningham's Peter Anthony Motteux (1933), and there are many important works on the career and literary activities of Dryden. The works of Dryden, Etherege, Wycherley, Congreve, Vanbrugh, Farquhar, and Otway have all been recently edited. Most of the other important authors of the period have had their works reprinted, but not always in a satisfactory form. Maidment and Logan's Dramatists of the Restoration is a useful series, but the text of the plays is unsatisfactory. Recent volumes edited by D. H. Stevens, Types of English Drama (1923), and by G. H. Nettleton and A. E. Case, British Dramatists from Dryden to Sheridan (1939), include a number of Restoration plays. Montague Summers' Restoration Comedies (1921) and Shakespeare Adaptations (1922) should also be consulted. Sybil Rosenfeld has an interesting volume on Strolling Players and Drama in the Provinces (1939).

(vi) EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

The standard authority for the history of drama from 1660 to 1830 is that of Genest, but his work is little more than a series of excerpts from newspapers and bills, by no means complete. The development of drama during this period has been traced by the present writer in Early Eighteenth Century Drama (1929) and Late Eighteenth Century Drama (1937). E. Bernbaum has an excellent study on The Drama of Sensibility (1915), and Bateson another on the comedy of the period (1929). G. Aitken's Steele (1889), W. L. Cross's The History of Henry Fielding (1910), and A. E. Gipson's John Home (1917) are important. F. E. Budd contributes an important introduction to his edition of Burnaby's works (1930). There is, besides, a large literature on Goldsmith and Sheridan. Some of the more valuable dramatic works of this period have been reprinted, and original editions are not so scarce as are those of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. D. F. Canfield's Corneille and Racine in England (1904) is important. For the domestic drama reference should be made to A. Eloesser's Das bürgerliche Drama (1898), F. O. Nolte's The Early Middle Class

Drama (1936), and Sir A. W. Ward's edition of The London Merchant ("Belles Lettres" series, 1906). F. Gaiffe's Le drame en France au dix-huitième siècle (1910) gives a clear account of the development of sentimental plays on the Parisian stage.

(vii) NINETEENTH CENTURY AND MODERN PERIOD

The present writer has a study of early nineteenth-century drama (1930), and another survey of the theatre from 1850 to 1900 (1946). E. Reynolds has a study of Early Victorian Drama (1936). Much information, of course, can be gained from the lives of the principal actors and dramatists of the time. On the theatre of the later nineteenth century and of our present day a considerable number of special studies has been written. A. E. Morgan has published a valuable volume on Tendencies of Modern English Drama (1924). Suggestive studies are William Archer's English Dramatists of To-day (1882) and The Old Drama and the New (1923), H. A. Jones' The Renascence of the English Drama (1895), J. Knight's Theatrical Notes (1893), H. Morley's The Journal of a London Playgoer (1891), T. H. Dickinson's The Contemporary Drama of England (1920), F. W. Chandler's Aspects of Modern Drama (1915), Barrett H. Clark's A Study of the Modern Drama (1925), Ashley Dukes' Modern Dramatists (1912) and The Youngest Drama (1923), A. Filon's The English Stage (1897), A. Henderson's The Changing Drama (1915), M. A. Franc's Ibsen in England (1919), C. Andrews' The Drama To-day (1913), W. L. Phelps' Essays on Modern Dramatists (1921), C. W. Scott's The Drama of Yesterday and To-day (1899), Watson Nicholson's The Struggle for a Free Stage in London (1906), J. Palmer's The Censor and the Theatres (1912), Storm Jameson's Modern Drama in Europe (1920), F. Vernon's The Twentieth-century Theatre (1924), Ivor Brown's Parties of the Play (1928), D. Byrne's The Story of Ireland's National Theatre (1929), A. E. Malone's The Irish Drama (1929), M. Ellehaug's Striking Figures among Modern English Dramatists (1931), and Peter Noble's British Theatre (1946).

Barrett H. Clark gives a full list of modern works on the subject of dramatic theory in his Study of the Modern Drama and surveys past endeavour in European Theories of the Drama. A selected bibliography is given as an appendix to the present writer's The Theory of Drama (1931). Particular note should be taken also of the new ideals in stagecraft. Gordon Craig's works are of great value, and such books as Kenneth MacGowan's Continental Stagecraft (1923) should be read in close connexion with the main tendencies in modern drama.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

II. SELECTED LIST OF PLAYS BY MINOR WRITERS

The following list is not intended to be in any way exhaustive. It includes merely the titles of some dramatic works which deserve attention either intrinsically or historically, but for which no room could be found in the text. The student of the theatre should note that many of these plays are of prime importance for an understanding of the audiences of the various periods and for an appreciation of dramatic development.

(i) To 1642

ALEXANDER, WILLIAM, EARL OF STIRLING. Important for the study of Senecan influence in England. The best edition is that prepared by L. E. Kastner and H. B. Charlton (1922).

ARMIN, ROBERT : The History of the Two Maids of More-Clacke (1609).

BARNES, BARNABE : The Divil's Charter (1607).

BARREY, LODOWICK : Ram-Alley ; Or Merrie-Tricks (1611).

CAVENDISH, WILLIAM, DUKE OF NEWCASTLE. Important for his development of comedy. The Country Captaine (1649), The Variety (1649), The Humorous Lovers (1677), The Triumphant Widow (1677).

COWLEY, ABRAHAM : The Guardian (1650).

DABORNE, ROBERT : The Poor-Man's Comfort (1655).

DENHAM, SIR JOHN : The Sophy (1642).

FIELD, NATHANIEL : A Woman is a Weather-cocke (1612), Amends for Ladies (1618).

GOFFE, THOMAS : The Raging Turke (1631), The Careles Shepherdess (1656).

HAUGHTON, WILLIAM : English-Men for my Money (1616).

KILLIGREW, THOMAS : Comedies and Tragedies (1664).

LOWER, SIR WILLIAM. Important for his translations from Quinault and Corneille.

MARKHAM, GERVAS : The Dumbe Knight (1608).

MARMION, SHAKERLEY : Hollands Leaguer (1632), The Antiquary (1641).

MAY, THOMAS : The Heire (1633).

BRITISH DRAMA

NABBES, THOMAS : The Bride (1640).

QUARLES, FRANCIS : The Virgin Widow (1649).

SHARPHAM, EDWARD : Cupid's Whirligig (1607).

TAILOR, ROBERT : The Hogge hath lost his Pearle (1614).

TATHAM, JOHN. Various plays, both before and after 1642.

TOMKIE, THOMAS : Albumazar (1615).

ANONYMOUS : The Weakest goeth to the Wall (1600), The Returne from Pernassus (1606), Wily Beguilde (1606), The Merry Devill of Edmonton (1608), Histrion-Mastix (1610), The London Chaunticleres (1659).

(ii) 1660-1700

ARROWSMITH, — : The Reformation (1673).

BANCROFT, JOHN : King Edward the Third (1691), Henry the Second (1693).

BETTERTON, THOMAS : The Amorous Widow (acted 1670 ; printed 1706), The Revenge (1680).

CARLISLE, JAMES : The Fortune Hunters (1689).

COTTON, CHARLES : Horace (1671).

D'AVENANT, DR CHARLES : Circe (1677).

DILKE, THOMAS : The City Lady (1697).

DOGGETT, THOMAS : The Country-Wake (1696).

DUFFETT, THOMAS : The Empress of Morocco (1674), The Mock-Tempest (1675).

FANE, SIR FRANCIS : Love in the Dark (1675).

GILDON, CHARLES : The Roman Bride's Revenge (1697), Love's Victim (1701).

GRANVILLE, GEORGE, LORD LANSDOWNE : The She-Gallants (1696), Heroick Love (1698), The Jew of Venice (1701), The British Enchanters (1706).

HIGDEN, HENRY : The Wary Widdow (1693).

HOPKINS, CHARLES : The Neglected Virtue (1696).

HOWARD, JAMES : The English Mounseieur (1674 ; acted 1666).

JEVON, THOMAS : The Devil of a Wife (1686).

LEANERD, JOHN : The Country Innocence (1677), The Counterfeits (1679).

MANLEY, MRS : The Lost Lover (1696), Almyna (1707).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- MOTTEUX, PETER ANTHONY : Love's a Jest (1696), The Novelty (1697).
- MOUNTFORT, WILLIAM : The Life and Death of Doctor Faustus (c. 1686 ; printed 1697).
- PAYNE, NEVIL : The Fatal Jealousie (1673).
- PIX, MRS MARY : The Spanish Wives (1696), The Deceiver Deceived (1698).
- PORDAGE, SAMUEL : Herod and Mariamne (1673), The Siege of Babylon (1678).
- PORTER, THOMAS : The Villain (1663), The Carnival (1664).
- POWELL, GEORGE. Various operas, comedies, and tragedies.
- RAWLINS, THOMAS : Tom Essence (1677), Tunbridge-Wells (1678).
- RHODES, RICHARD : Flora's Vagaries (1670 ; acted 1663).
- RYMER, THOMAS : Edgar (1678).
- ST SERFE, SIR THOMAS : Tarugo's Wiles (1668).
- SEDLEY, SIR CHARLES : The Mulberry-Garden (1668), Antony and Cleopatra (1677), Bellamira (1687).
- SOUTHERNE, THOMAS : The Loyal Brother (1682), The Disappointment (1684), Sir Anthony Love (1691), The Fatal Marriage (1694), Oroonoko (1696).
- TUKE, SIR SAMUEL : The Adventures of Five Hours (1663).
- WILMOT, JOHN, EARL OF ROCHESTER : Valentinian (1685).
- ANONYMOUS : The Mall (1674), The Mistaken Husband (1675), The Muse of New-Market (1680), Wit for Money (1691).

(iii) 1700-50

- AUBERT, MRS : Harlequin-Hydaspes (1719).
- BAKER, THOMAS : The Humour of the Age (1701), Tunbridge-Walks (1703).
- BECKINGHAM, CHARLES : Scipio Africanus (1718).
- BOADENS, CHARLES : The Modish Couple (1732).
- BOYLE, CHARLES, EARL OF ORRERY : As You Find It (1703).
- BROOKE, HENRY : Gustavus Vasa (1739).
- BULLOCK, CHRISTOPHER : Woman's Revenge (1715), The Cobler of Preston (1716), Woman is a Riddle (1717).

BRITISH DRAMA

- BURNABY, CHARLES : The Reform'd Wife (1700), The Ladies' Visiting-Day (1701), The Modish Husband (1702), Love Betray'd (1703).
- CAREY, HENRY : The Dragon of Wantley (1737).
- CHETWOOD, WILLIAM RUFUS : The Lover's Opera (1729).
- CIBBER, THEOPHILUS : Patie and Peggie (1730), The Harlot's Progress (1733).
- COFFEY, CHARLES : The Beggar's Wedding (1729), The Devil to Pay (1731).
- DALTON, DR JOHN : Comus (1738).
- DENNIS, JOHN : Iphigenia (1700), The Comical Gallant (1702), The Invader of his Country (1720).
- FENTON, ELIJAH : Mariamne (1723).
- GARRICK, DAVID. Important for his farces and adaptations of Shakespeare.
- HAVARD, WILLIAM : Scanderbeg (1733), King Charles the First (1737).
- HILL, AARON : The Fatal Vision (1716), Zara (1736), Alzira (1736).
- HIPPISLEY, JOHN : Flora (1729).
- HOADLY, DR BENJAMIN : The Suspicious Husband (1747).
- HUGHES, JOHN : The Siege of Damascus (1720).
- JOHNSON, CHARLES. An exceedingly interesting writer who touched almost all the types of dramatic activity in his time.
- MARTYN, BENJAMIN : Timoleon (1730).
- MILLER, JAMES : The Mother-in-Law (1734), The Man of Taste (1735), The Universal Passion (1737).
- NORRIS, HENRY : The Royal Merchant (1706).
- POPPLE, WILLIAM : The Lady's Revenge (1734), The Double Deceit (1735).
- SAVAGE, RICHARD : Love in a Veil (1719), Sir Thomas Overbury (1724).
- SEWELL, GEORGE : The Tragedy of Sir Walter Raleigh (1719).
- SMYTHE, JAMES MOORE : The Rival Modes (1727).
- TAVERNER, WILLIAM : The Artful Husband (1717).
- THURMOND, JOHN. Various pantomimes.
- YOUNG, EDWARD : Busiris (1719), The Revenge (1721).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

(iv) 1750-1800

- BENTLEY, R. : The Wishes (1761), Philodamus (1767).
BRAND, MISS HANNAH : Huniades (1792).
BROOKE, MRS FRANCES : Virginia (1756).
BROWN, JOHN : Barbarossa (1755), Athelstan (1756).
BURGOYNE, GENERAL JOHN : The Lord of the Manor (1780), The Heiress (1786).
COBB, JOHN : The Strangers at Home (1786), The Haunted Tower (1789).
CRISP, SAMUEL : Virginia (1754).
FRANCKLIN, THOMAS : The Earl of Warwick (1766).
GLOVER, RICHARD : Boadicia (1753).
GRIFFITH, ELIZABETH : The School for Rakes (1769).
HAWKESWORTH, JOHN : Edgar and Emmeline (1761).
HOARE, PRINCE : Indiscretion (1800). Many translations from the German.
HOOLE, JOHN : Cyrus (1768), Cleonice (1775).
HULL, THOMAS : Henry the Second (1774).
JONES, HENRY : The Earl of Essex (1753).
KEMBLE, JOHN P. Important for his adaptations of Shakespeare.
KENRICK, WILLIAM : Falstaff's Wedding (1760).
MACNALLY, L. : Fashionable Levities (1785).
MALLET, DAVID : Eurydice (1731), Mustapha (1739), Elvira (1763).
MASON, W. : Elfrida (1752), Caractacus (1759).
MORE, HANNAH : Percy (1785), The Fatal Falsehood (1779).
O'KEEFFE, JOHN. Important for his musical comedies.
REED, JOSEPH : The Register Office (1761).
SHERIDAN, MRS FRANCES : The Discovery (1763).
TOWNLEY, JAMES : High Life below Stairs (1759).
VAUGHAN, T. : Loves Vagaries (acted 1776 ; printed 1791).
WHITEHEAD, WILLIAM : The Roman Father (1750), Creusa (1754).

BRITISH DRAMA

(v) THE ROMANTIC PERIOD (1800 TO THE SEVENTIES AND EIGHTIES)

- ARNOLD, S. J. : The Shipwreck (1796), The Devil's Bridge (acted 1812 ; printed 1820).
- BERNARD, W. B. : The Irish Attorney (1840), Louise (1843).
- BLANCHARD, E. L. : Faith, Hope and Charity (1845).
- BROOKS, C. W. S. : The Guardian Angel (1849).
- BROUGH, R. B. : Kensington Gardens (1851), Alfred the Great (1859).
- BUCHANAN, R. W. : Alone in London (1885), Sophia (1886), A Man's Shadow (1889).
- BUCKSTONE, J. B. : Damon and Pithias (1831), The Flowers of the Forest (1847).
- BYRON, H. J. : Uncle Dick's Darling (1868), Our Boys (1875).
- CRAVEN, H. T. : Miriam's Crime (1863), Meg's Diversion (1866).
- FITZBALL, EDWARD. Many adaptations from Scott.
- GROVER, H. M. : Socrates (1828).
- HARWOOD, ISABELLA (" ROSS NEIL ") : Inez (1871), The King and the Angel (1874).
- JERROLD, D. W. : Beau Nash (1834). A prolific writer of comedies and farces.
- MATTHEWS, C. J. : Married for Money (1855).
- MERITT, PAUL : Linked by Love (1872).
- MERIVALE, H. C. : All for Her (1875), Florien (1884).
- MONCRIEFF, W. T. Many adaptations.
- OXENFORD, JOHN : The Dice of Death (1835).
- PHILLIPS, WATTS : The Woman in Mauve (1864).
- SIMS, GEORGE R. Many farces and light comedies.
- STEVENSON, R. L., and W. E. HENLEY : Deacon Brodie, Beau Austin, Admiral Guinea (1892).

INDEX

Dates of birth and death are inserted after the names of British dramatists not now living.

- ABBEY THEATRE, Dublin, 367, 391-392, 400, 405, 432
 Abdalla, 308
 Abelard, 23
 Abercrombie, Lascelles, 405, 474-476, 481
 Abra-Mule, 266
 Abraham (Hrotswitha), 18
 Abraham and Isaac (Northampton mystery play), 29, 39
 Abraham Lincoln, 484, 489, 490
 Abraham's Sacrifice, 33-35
 Ackerley, J. R., 462
 Acolastus, 51
 Actors in sixteenth century, 67
 Actresses introduced on the stage, 221-222
 Adam, 23
 Adder, The, 475
 Adding Machine, The, 448
 Addison, Joseph (1672-1719), 236, 240, 252, 263, 265-266
 Adelaide, 316
 Admirable Crichton, The, 421, 422-423
 Æschylus, 13, 14, 251, 341, 372, 425
 Æsop, 258
 After All, 460
 Aftermath, 396
 Agamemnon, 265-266, 480
 Aglaura, 108, 195-196, 212, 363
 Alberty, James (1838-89), 349
 Albion and Albanus, 239
 Albovine, 196
 Alchemist, The, 117, 148, 154
 Alcibiades, 232
 Alexander, Campaspe, and Diogenes, 91, 94
 Alf's Button, 471
 Alice Sit-by-the-Fire, 423-424
 All Change Here, 466
 All Fools, 155, 156, 160
 All for Love, 225, 226, 233, 234-235, 236
 All in the Wrong, 291
 All's Lost by Lust, 196
 All's One, 198
 All's Well that Ends Well, 127, 130-131
 Alphonsus Emperour of Germany, 97-98, 180
 Alphonsus King of Aragon, 88-89
 Amateur movement, the, 454
 Ambitious Stepmother, The, 267
 Amboyna, 235
 Amends for Ladies, 166
 Amiel, Denys, 449
 Aminta, 145
 Amoroso, King of Little Britain, 332
 Amphitruo, 51
 Amphitryon, 247
 Amyntas, 145
 Anatomist, The (Bridie), 494
 Anatomist, The (Ravenscroft), 249
 Ancey, Georges, 345
 And So to Bed, 470
 Anderson, Maxwell, 449, 481
 Andrea of Hungary, 317
 Andreiev, Leonid, 449
 Androcles and the Lion, 436, 441, 457
 Angels and Ministers, 497
 Annajanska, the Bolshevik Empress, 436
 Anthony, C. L., 465
 Antiquary, The, 165
 Antonio and Mellida, 172, 173, 180
 Antonio's Revenge, 172-173
 Antony and Cleopatra, 111, 119, 169, 176-177, 191, 220, 234, 235
 Apus and Virginia, 53-54, 57
 Apostate, The, 316
 Appius and Virginia (Webster), 184
 Apple Cart, The, 456, 457
 Arcadia, The, 145
 Archer, William, 332, 342, 350, 356, 466
 Archipropheta, 51
 Arden of Feversham, 95, 119, 197, 198, 204
 Arduorlich's Wife, 480
 Ariadne, or Business First, 464
 Ariosto, Lodovico, 59
 Aristophanes, 425
 Aristotle, 171, 226

BRITISH DRAMA

- Arms and the Man*, 437-438
Arrah-na-Pogue, 332
Arraignment of Paris, The, 75
Arsinoe, 239
Artful Wife, The, 284
Arthur, King, 239
Arts Council, the, 454
As in a Looking Glass, 352
As You Like It, 14, 90, 93, 104, 107, 109, 117, 122, 125-126, 128, 222
Ascent of F6, The, 482
Assassin, The, 482
Assignation, The, 247
At Mrs Beam's, 429, 470, 483
Atheist's Tragedy, The, 185-186
Auden, W. H., 481-482
Audience, characteristics of, in sixteenth century, 99-100; in seventeenth century, 112-119; in Restoration times, 219; in eighteenth century, 259-262, 327; in early nineteenth century, 302-303; in late nineteenth century, 335-336; in twentieth century, 454-455
Augier, Émile, 334, 344, 362
Augustus in Search of a Father, 430
Aulularia, 152
Aureng-Zebe, 226
Autumn Crocus, 465
Aveugles, Les, 346

Babes in the Wood, 495
Back to Methuselah, 429, 436, 440, 441, 456, 457
Baillie, Joanna (1762-1851), 301; her dramatic work, 310-311, 312; Plays on the Passions, 310
Baker, Elizabeth, 382-383
Bale, John (1495-1563); 51, 63, 205
Ball, The, 155
Ballad-opera, 271-275
Banbury Nose, The, 466
Banks, John (fl. 1690-96), 267, 268, 296; his dramatic work, 237
Barretts of Wimpole Street, The, 492-493
Barrie, Sir James (1860-1937), 432, 436, 443, 463, 472, 485, 493; his dramatic work, 421-424, 446
Barry, Elizabeth, 221, 262
Bartholomew Fair, 117, 148, 151, 154, 243
Bashful Lover, The, 138
Bassano, Francesco Nigri de, 51
Battle of Alcazar, The, 75
Baty, Gaston, 449
Bax, Clifford, 449, 485, 488, 489, 491-492

Beaumont, Francis (1584-1616), and Fletcher, John (1579-1625), 109, 111, 113, 115, 118, 131, 142, 188, 198, 211, 213, 218, 223; romantic tragi-comedy of, 14, 106, 131-135; their influence on Shakespeare, 135-138; realistic comedy of, 159-162; revenge tragedy of, 181-184
Beaux' Stratagem, The, 257
Becket, 355
Becque, Henry, 345
Beddoes, Thomas Lovell (1803-49), 320-321, 474
Beeston, Christopher, 216-217
Beeston, William, 216-217, 218
Beggar's Opera, The, 241, 272-273, 336, 360
Behn, Aphra (1640-89), 281, 291; her dramatic work, 248
Bell, J. J. (1871-1934), 389
Bennett, Arnold (1867-1931), 386, 390, 430; the Clayhanger series, 386; The Old Wives' Tale, 386
Beverice, 376
Berkeley, Reginald (1890-1935), 444n., 453, 484-485
Berkeley, Sir William (1605-77), 143
Bernard, Jean-Jacques, 449
Bertram, 316
Besier, Rudolph (1878-1942), 401, 431, 492-493
Betterton, Thomas (1635-1710), 221, 262
Bettler, Der, 447
Bickerstaffe, Isaac (1735-87), 278
Bill of Divorcement, A, 383, 459, 461
Bird in a Cage, The, 142
Bird in Hand, The, 470
Birthright, 396-397
Björnson, Björnstjerne, 343-344, 345
Black Prince, The, 226, 231
Blackfriars theatre, 67, 108
Blind, 475
Blind Beggar of Alexandria, The, 155
Blindness of Virtue, The, 390
Blithe Spirit, 470
Bloody Brother, The, 183
Blot in the 'Scutcheon, A, 320
Blurt Master-Constable, 163
Boaden, James, 325-326; Life of Kemble, 302
Boccaccio, Giovanni, 61
Bold Stroke for a Husband, A, 291
Bondman, The, 137
Bonduca, 133, 136, 139, 175
Booth, B., 262

INDEX

- Borderers, The*, 312
 Botticelli, Sandro, 92
 Bottomley, Gordon, 402, 405, 473-474, 476-481, 489, 493
 Boucicault, Dion (1822-90), 331-332, 333, 391
 Bouilly, Jean Nicolas, 288
Bourgeois Gentilhomme, Le, 249
 Boyle, Roger, Earl of Orrery (1621-79), 106, 142, 223, 226
 Bracegirdle, Mrs Anne, 221
 Brambs, J. G., edition of Χριστός Πάσχω by, 18
 Brandane, John, 493
 Brandes, Johann Christian, 288
Breadwinner, The, 469
Breaking a Butterfly, 351
Bride's Tragedy, The, 321
 Bridie, James, 493-495
Briery Gap, The, 396
 Brieux, Eugène, 345
 Brighthouse, Harold, 386, 432
Britain's Daughter, 478-479
Britannia Triumphans, 212 n.
 British Drama League, 454, 480
Briton, The, 268
Broken Heart, The, 191-192
Broken Hearts, 354
Broken Soil, The, 397
 Brome, Richard (d. 1652?), 166-167
 Brontë, Charlotte, Shirley, 279
 Brooke, Henry (1703?-83), 268
 Brooke, Rupert (1887-1915), 298
Brothers, The, 141
 Brough, Robert Barnabas (1828-60), 332, 333
 Brown, Armitage, 313
 Browne, Martin, 482
 Browne, R. Gore-, 465
 Browning, Robert (1812-89), 342;
 his dramatic work, 318-320
Bugbears, The, 60
Builder of Bridges, The, 380
 Bulwer-Lytton, Edward, Lord
 Lytton (1803-73), 331, 333
Bunch of Violets, A, 350
Bunty pulls the Strings, 431-432
 Burbage, James, 107
Burial and Resurrection, The, 29
 Burnaby, Charles (fl. 1703), 279
Bury Fair, 244
 Bussy D'Ambois, 181
Buster, 466
Byron, Charles Duke of, 181
 Byron, George, Lord (1788-1824),
 263, 309, 316; his dramatic work,
 313, 314, 315
 Byron, Henry James (1835-84), 333
Cæsar and Cleopatra, 434, 438
Cæsar's Wife, 468
Cain, 314
Caius Marius, 233
 Calderon, George, 430
 Calderon de la Barca, 119
Calisto and Melebea, 49, 51, 52, 53, 54-56
Callimachus, 18
 Calthrop, Dion Clayton (1878-1937), 372
Camaralzaman and Badoura, 333
Cambrises, 53
 Cambridge Festival Theatre, 480
Cambyzes, King of Persia, 230
Camilla, 239
 Cammaerts, Émile, 492
Campbell of Kilmhor, 493
Campden Wonder, The, 378
 Campion, Thomas (d. 1619), 211
Canavans, The, 434
Candida, 436, 438
 Cannan, Gilbert, 390, 447
 Capek, Karel, 449
Captain Thomas Stukeley, 63
Captivi, 152
Cardinal, The, 194-195
 Carew, Thomas (1598?-1639?),
 211
 Carey, Henry (fl. 1743), 276, 277
 Carlyle, Thomas, 340
 Carroll, P. V., 486, 487
 Cartwright, George (fl. 1660), 226
 Cartwright, William (1611-43), 143
Case is Altered, The, 148, 151, 152
Cassilis Engagement, The, 380, 381
Caste, 347, 348
Castle of Perseverance, The, 44
Castle Spectre, The, 312, 328
Cataract of the Ganges, The, 328
Cathleen Ni Houlihan, 409, 410
Catiline, 64
Cato, 236, 265
Cat's Cradle, The, 465
Cavalcade, 452, 453, 469
Celestina, 49, 53
 Celtes, Konrad, edition of Hrots-witha's plays by, 17 n.
 CEMA, 454
Cenci, The, 313-314
 Censorship, 305
 Centlivre, Susanna (1667-1723), 279,
 291; her dramatic work, 284
 Cervantes, Miguel, 142
Chabot, Admiral of France, 181
Chains, 382-383, 459
 Chamberlayne, William (1619-89),
 224

BRITISH DRAMA

- Chambers, C. Haddon (1860-1921), 379
 Chambers, Sir E. K., Mediæval Stage, 19 n., 21 n., 23, 48 n., 337; Elizabethan Stage, 337
Change, 390
Changeling, The, 190-191
Changes, 141, 166
 Chapin, Harold (1884-1915), 430, 469
 Chapman, George (1559-1634), 97, 101, 116, 148, 211; his dramatic work, 154-157, 181-182
 Charles I, characteristics of, 104-105
Charles I (Havard), 268
 Charles II, restoration of, 105, 216, 218-219
Charles and Mary, 495
Chaste Maid in Cheapside, A, 117
 Chaucer, Geoffrey, 178
Cheats, The, 245
Cheats of Scapin, The, 224, 271
 Cheke, Henry (1548?-86), 51
 Chester, Charles, 152
 Chester mystery cycle, 29, 32-35
 Chettle, Henry (d. 1607), 96, 97, 181, 199 n.
Chief Promises of God unto Man, The, 51
Choice, The, 428
Χριστός Πάσχων, 18
Christus redivivus, 51
 Chronicle histories, 63-64, 94, 205-209
Chrononhotonthologos, 276
Chu Chin Chow, 402
 Church, influence of the, in development of drama, 20
 Cibber, Colley (1671-1757), dramatic work of, 277, 281-282, 469
 Cinema, art of the, 451-453
 Cinthio, Hecatommithi, 130
Circle, The, 468-469, 470
Citizen turned Gentleman, The, 249
City-Heiress, The, 248
City Madam, The, 117, 162
City Match, The, 164-165
City Night-Cap, The, 142-143
Clancy Name, The, 392-393
Clandestine Marriage, The, 290-291
Clara Gibbings, 465
 Claudel, Paul, 449
Cleomenes, 235
 Clergy, attitude of, to drama, 24-25
 Cobb, James (1756-1818), 289
Cælia, 298
Cælum Britannicum, 211
 516
 Cokain, Sir Aston (1608-84), 249
 Coleridge, Samuel Taylor (1772-1834), 425; his dramatic work, 310, 311-312; his poetical work, 328
Colleen Bawn, The, 332
 Collier, Jeremy, his attack on the stage, 255-256
 Colman, George, the Elder (1732-94), 273; his dramatic work, 290
 Colman, George, the Younger (1762-1836), 326
Colombe's Birthday, 320
 Colum, Padraic, 392; his dramatic work, 397-399
 Comedy, satire in, 117, 360; intrigue type in early seventeenth century, 119-120; realistic in seventeenth century, 146-168; intrigue and humours type in Restoration period, 242-250; sentimental type, 279-288; revival in eighteenth century, 289-295; of manners, 360, 425-432, 466-470; of purpose, 360-361; in modern period, 425-445
Comical Revenge, The, 144, 251-252
Coming of Christ, The, 403
Commedia dell'arte, 59, 270, 424, 491
Commedia erudita, 59
Committee, The, 245
 Compagnie des Quinze, the, 449
Comus, 211
Confederacy, The, 258
 Congreve, William (1670-1729), 162, 224, 243, 247, 252, 257, 258, 261, 279, 280, 290, 295, 354, 360, 427, 467, 469; his dramatic work, 245-255
 Connell, Norreys, 495
Conquering Hero, The, 461
Conquest of Granada, The, 226, 228-230
Conscious Lovers, The, 283-284, 288, 325
Constant Couple, The, 257
Constant Wife, The, 469
Contention, The First Part of the, 63
Contention for Honour and Riches, A, 211
 Conventions of Elizabethan theatre, 70
Conversion of St Paul, The, 39
 Cooke, Thomas (1703-56), 298
Corbeaux, Les, 345
Coriolanus (Shakespeare), 119, 169, 177-178, 302

INDEX

- Coriolanus* (Thomson), 265-266
Corn is Green, The, 465
 Corneille, Pierre, 231
Cornelia, 62, 86
Cornélie, 86
 Cornish mystery plays, 29
 Corpus Christi festival, 25
 Corrie, J., 493
Cosmo de Medici, 321
 Costume in medieval plays, 26; in Elizabethan plays, 69, 71-72
Count Arezzi, The, 317-318
Count Julian, 317
Count of Narbonne, The, 308
Countess Cathleen, The, 406-409
Country House, The, 258
Country Wife, The, 252-253
Cousin Kate, 429
 Covent Garden, theatre in, 260, 335, 337
Covent Garden Tragedy, The, 273-274
 Coventry mystery cycle, 29
 Coward, Noel, 469-470; Collected Sketches and Lyrics, 468
 Cowley, Abraham (1618-67), 426
 Cowley, Hannah (1743-1809), 291
Coxcomb, The, 160
Crabbed Youth and Age, 392
 Craig, Gordon, 446, 451
Crier by Night, The, 477
Critic, The, 273, 276-277, 294
 Cromwell, Oliver, 105
 Cronin, A. J., 465
Cross Roads, The, 393-394
 Crowne, John (d. 1703), his dramatic work, 230, 248
Croxton Sacrament, The, 39
Crucifixion, The (Wakefield cycle), 37-38, 40
Cruel Brother, The, 196
Cruel Debtor, The, 47
Cruelty of the Spaniards in Peru, The, 238
Cuckolds' Haven, 249
Cuish-ma-Chree, 332
Culbin Sands, 480
 Cumberland, Richard (1732-1811), 291, 292, 295; his dramatic work, 287-288
Cupid in Clapham, 383
Cupid's Revenge, 182
 Curel, François de, 345
Curfew, The, 309, 310
Custom of the Country, The, 133
Cymbeline, 106, 109n., 135, 136, 139, 175
Cynara, 465
Cynthia's Revels, 148, 153
Cyril's Success, 349
Damon and Phillida, 277
Damon and Pithias (Edwards), 53, 56
Dance of Death, The, 345
Dance of Life, The, 486
 Dancing in the theatres, 269-270
 Dancourt, Florent-Carton de, 258
Dandy Dick, 350
 Dane, Clemence, 383, 459, 461, 489
Dangerous Corner, 487
 Daniel, Samuel (1563-1619), 211
 Dante, 401
Dark Angel, The, 462
Dark Lady of the Sonnets, The, 441
 Darlington, W. A., 471
 D'Avenant, Sir William (1606-68), 19, 106, 198, 211, 217, 218, 222, 224; his dramatic work, 140, 142, 196, 212, 238-239
 Davenport, Robert (fl. 1623), 142
David and Fair Bethsabe, King, 75, 77, 94
David Ballard, 390
 Davies, Hubert Henry (1869-1917), 429
 Davis, Moll, 221, 269
 Day, John (fl. 1606), 98, 199n.
De Montfort, 311
De Vera Nobilitate, 53
Deaf and Dumb, 288-289
Dean's Daughter, The, 352
Dear Brutus, 369, 421, 423, 424
Dear Octopus, 465
Death of Marlowe, The, 321
Death's Jest Book, 321
Deborah, 475, 476
Decamerone, 61
 Defoe, Daniel, 329
Deirdre, 409-410
Deirdre of the Sorrows, 411, 413-415, 416, 432
 Dekker, Thomas (1570?-1641), 101, 108, 112, 115, 143, 154, 197, 213; his dramatic work, 137, 157-159, 199-201
 Delacour, 350
 Delafield, E. M. (1891-1943), 465
 Delap, John (fl. 1762), 308
Delightful, Diverting, and Devotional Play of Mrs Fitzherbert, The, 495
Deluge, The (Chester cycle), 32-33
Demi-Monde, 334
 Dennis, John (1657-1734), 263, 264
Der Tag, 422
Derby Day, 471
Desert Highway, 487

BRITISH DRAMA

- Deserter, The*, 475
Destruction of Jerusalem, The, 230
Destruction of Troy, The, 237
Devil, The, 464
Devil is an Ass, The, 148
Devil's Disciple, The, 440
Devil to Pay, The, 482
Dialogue concerning Witty and Witless, A, 49
 Dibdin, Charles (1745-1814), 328
 Dibdin, Thomas, 328
 Dickens, Charles, 329
Dido, Queen of Carthage, Nashe's share in, 75; Marlowe's share in, 78
Dies Irae, 447
 "Digby" plays, 29, 39
 Dimond, William (fl. 1805), 326-327, 328
Disbanded Officer, The, 324
Disraeli, 431
Distressed Mother, The, 264
Diversion, 460
Divina Commedia, La, 32
Dr Faustus, 73, 74, 78, 80, 82, 83, 84, 85, 99
Doctor's Dilemma, The, 441
 Dodsley, Robert (1703-64), 285
Dog beneath the Skin, The, 482
 Dolce, Lodovico, 62
Doll's House, A, 342, 351
Don, 431
Don Carlos, 232
Don Sebastian, 235
 Donne, John (1573-1631), 117
 Doors, in Elizabethan theatres, 68
 Dorset Garden, theatre in, 218, 259
Double Dealer, The, 254
Double Gallant, The, 282
 Douglas (1756), 308
Dover Road, The, 463
Down our Street, 459, 460
 Doyle, Sir Arthur Conan, 378
Dragon of Wantley, The, 277
 Drake, Sir Francis, 102
Drake, The History of Sir Francis, 238
 Drama, realist, 446; impressionist, 447; naturalist, 447; expressionist, 448-450
Dream Physician, The, 418
Dreamers, The, 394, 395-396
 Drinkwater, John, dramatic work, 403-405, 453, 470, 484, 489-490
 Drolls, 215-216
Druid's Rest, 465
 Drury Lane, Phoenix theatre in, 67; Theatre Royal, 218, 301-302, 452
 Dryden, John (1631-1700), 106, 142, 143, 144, 161, 222, 225, 233, 238, 243, 245, 246, 250, 252, 261, 263, 266; his heroic tragedies, 226-230; Mac Flecknoe, 228; Absalom and Achitophel, 228; blank-verse dramas, 234-235; operas, 239; comedies, 246-248
Duchess of Malfi, The, 184-185
Duchess of Padua, The, 426
Duenna, The, 277-278, 294
Duke and No Duke, A, 249
Duke of Milan, The, 188-189
Duke's Mistress, The, 194
 Dukes, Ashley, 448, 453, 492
Dulcitius, 18
 Dullin, Charles, 449
 Dumas, Alphonse, 344
Dumb Lady, The, 245
Dumb Wife of Cheapside, The, 453
 Dunsany, E. J. M. D. Plunkett, Baron, 485; his dramatic work, 418-421, 447
 D'Urfey, Thomas (1653-1723), 239, 241, 281; his dramatic work, 249-250
Dutch Lover, The, 248
Dynasts, The, 443

Eastward Ho, 155, 156-157, 162, 249
Edith, 383
Education of Mr Surrage, The, 430
Edward I, King, 75, 205
Edward II, King, 78, 85-86, 205
Edward III, King, 63
Edward and Eleonora, 265-266
Edward the Black Prince, 268
 Edwards, Richard (1523?-66), 53
Eight o'Clock, 484
El Dorado, 496
Elckerlijck, 43
Eldest Son, The, 368 371, 386
Elfrid, 268
 Eliot, T. S., 481, 482
Eliza comes to Stay, 430
 Elizabeth, Queen, historical importance of, 102-103
Empress of Morocco, The, 226, 230
Enchanted Cottage, The, 365, 458
Enchanted Sea, An, 418
End of the World, The, 475
Endimion, 91, 93
Enemy of the People, An, 339
English Traveller, The, 108, 113, 119, 199, 203
Englishmen for my Money, 98
Epicoene, 148, 154
Epsom Wells, 244

INDEX

- Ervine, St John, 388; his dramatic work, 367, 386-389, 391, 392, 458, 461, 462, 470, 489
Escape, 475
 Esmond, H. V. (d. 1922), 430
Esther, 376
 Ethelwold, Bishop of Winchester, prepares Concordia Regularis, 21
 Etherage, Sir George (1635-91), 102, 144, 162, 213, 224, 243, 247, 254, 261, 279, 280; his dramatic work, 251-252, 467
 Euripides, 14, 15, 62
Eurydice, 266
Evadne, 316
Evening's Love, An, 247
Every Man in his Humour, 117, 148-151, 243
Every Man out of his Humour, 148, 151, 152-153, 156
Everyman, 43
 Evreinov, N. N., 449
Exodus, 464
 'Expressionistic' School, 483-487
 FAGAN, J. B. (1873-1933), 470, 489
Fair Maid of the Inn, The, 134-135
Fair Maid of the West, The, 108
Fair Quarrel, A, 114, 117, 139-140
Faithful, The, 403
Faithful Shepherdess, The, 145
Fall, The, Grocers' play at Norwich, 29, 39
Fall of Robespierre, The, 311
Fall of the City, The, 453
Falsche Scham, 324
False Delicacy, 286-287
False Friend, The, 258
Family Reunion, 481
Famous Victories of Henry the Fifth, The, 63, 99
Fanatics, The, 469
Fancies, Chaste and Noble, The, 140-141
Far-off Hills, The, 433
Farmer's Wife, The, 432
 Farquhar, George (1678-1707), 161, 243, 279; his dramatic work, 257-258
Fascinating Mr Vanderveldt, The, 428, 429
Fashionable Lover, The, 287
Fatal Contract, The, 195
Fatal Curiosity, 297-298
Fatal Discovery, The, 308, 325
Fatal Dowry, The, 108, 114, 115, 267
Fatal Extravagance, The, 297
Fatal Falsehood, 298
Father, The, 345, 446
Fathers and Sons, 390
Fazio, 316-317
Fedele and Fortunio, 96
 Ferguson, J. A., 493
 Fernald, C. B., 462
Ferrex and Porrex—see Gorboduc
 Feuillerat, Professor, edition of Revels' Books, 48
 Ffrancon-Davies, Gwen, 492
Fiddler's House, The, 397, 398, 399
 Field, Nathaniel (1587-1633), 114, 166, 183
 Fielding, Henry (1707-54), 329; his dramatic work, 273-276; Tom Jones, 290
Fifth of November, The, 496
First Blood, 461-462
First Floor, The, 289
First Gentleman, The, 497
First Mrs Fraser, The, 470
 Fisher, Jasper (fl. 1639), 175
Five Plays of Other Times, 492
Flashing Stream, The, 487
 Flecker, J. E. (1884-1915), 401-402
 Fletcher, John (1579-1625), 102, 112, 120, 138, 140, 141, 145, 209, 309. See also Beaumont and Fletcher
Flora, 277
Followers, 432
Fontainville Forest, 325-326
Fool turned Critic, The, 249
Fool's Paradise, A, 350
 Foote, Samuel (1720-77), 290
For Services Rendered, 465
Forced Marriage, The, 248
 Ford, John (1586-1640?), 101, 102, 104, 112, 113, 115, 168, 213, 214, 227, 228; his dramatic work, 140-141, 191-193, 209
Forest, The, 458
Forrigan Reel, The, 495
 Fortune, the, theatre, 67
 Forzano, Giovacchino, 453
Foscari, The, 317
Foundling, The, 287
Foundling of the Forest, The, 326-327
Fountain, The, 430
Fountain Head, The, 492
Four P. P., The, 49, 50-51
Four Plays for Dancers, 406
 Francis, John Oswald, 390
Frederick, Duke of Brunswick-Lunen-burgh, 268
Fredolfo, 316
Freewill, 51

French influence on Restoration drama, 223-224; on eighteenth-century drama, 270, 284-285
French without Tears, 471
 Freud, Siegmund, 358
Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay, 74, 88, 89, 96
Frou-Frou, 334
Fugitive, The, 368, 371
Fuimus Troes, 175
Fulgens and Lucres, 47, 49, 51, 53, 57
Funeral, The (Steele), 283
Funeral, The (Synge), 415-416

Gallathea, 91
Gallicanus, 18
 Galsworthy, John (1867-1933), 358, 359, 374, 375, 436; his dramatic work, 367-372, 379, 386, 425, 431, 457, 458, 461
Gamester, The (Centlivre), 284
Gamester, The (Moore), 298-299
Gamester, The (Shirley), 141-142
Gammer Gurton's Needle, 58-59
 Garnier, Richard, 86
 Garrick, David, 259, 261, 264
Gas, 448, 452, 483
 Gascoigne, George (1525?-77), 59, 61, 62
Gauntlet, A, 344
Gawayn and the Green Knight, 101
 Gay, John (1685-1732), 272-273, 336
Gentleman Dancing Master, The, 252
Gentleman Usher, The, 155-156
Gentleness and Nobility, Of, 49
 Geoffrey of Monmouth, 61
 George, Ernest, 459
George a Greene, 96, 434
George and Margaret, 471
 German influence on English drama, 309, 323, 386, 387, 448
German Hotel, The, 288-289
Gesta Romanorum, 127
Getting Married, 429, 441
Ghosts, 339, 341, 342, 400
 Gilbert, W. S. (1804-90), 278, 333, 353-355
 Gildon, Charles (1665-1724), 263, 266
 Ginsbury, Norman, 497
Giocasta, 62
Giovanna of Naples, 317
Glen is Mine, The, 493
Glencoe, 318
Glittering Gate, The, 419, 420
 Globe, the, theatre, 67, 107, 337
 520

Gloriana, 232
 Glover, Halcott, 464
God of Quiet, The, 403
God's Amateur, 465
Gods of the Mountain, The, 419, 420
 Godfrey, Peter, 486
 Godwin, William, Caleb Williams, 326
 Goethe, J. W. von, 315, 323, 324
 Goldsmith, Oliver (1728-74), 428; his dramatic work, 291-293
Good Friday, 403
Good-natured Man, The, 291-292
Gorboduc, 61, 80, 88, 94
 Gorky, Maxim, 346
 Gosse, Sir Edmund, 342, 347
Götz von Berlichingen, 312, 315, 323, 324
 Gow, Ronald, 465
Grand Cham's Diamond, The, 430
Grangecolman, 418
 Granville-Barker, H. (1877-1946), 358, 368, 372-376, 379, 390, 431, 444, 457, 458
Grateful Servant, The, 142
 Gray, Terence, 480, 486
 Grazzini, A. F., 60
Great Adventure, The, 430
Great Broxopp, The, 463
 Greek drama, 14-17
Green Bay-tree, The, 464
 Greene, Robert (1560?-92), 51, 52, 64, 92, 94, 96, 97, 122, 205; university career of, 73; Menaophon, 74; Groatworth of Wit, 74; his dramatic work, 88-90
 Greenwood, Walter, 465
 Greg, Dr W. W., 71 n., 75 n., 99 n., 199 n.
 Gregory, Lady I. A. (1859-1932), 391; her dramatic work, 433-435, 489
 Gregory Nazianzene, St, 18 n.
Gregory VII, 321
 Grein, J. T., 342
 Gribble, G. D., 496
Grim the Collier of Croydon, 98
 Grimald, Nicholas, 51
Gruach, 477, 478, 479, 489
 Grundy, Sydney (1848-1914), his dramatic work, 349-350, 352
Guardian, The, 114
 Guilds, relation of, to mysteries, 31
 Guilpin, 117
Guinea Pig, The, 466
Gustavus Vasa, 268
 Gwyn, Nell, 221, 262
Gyges und sein Ring, 343

INDEX

- HABINGTON, WILLIAM (1605-54), 108, 143
 Hackett, Walter, 471
 Halévy, Ludovic, 344; his dramatic work, 334
 Hall, Anmer, 494
 Hamilton, Cicely, 458
 Hamilton, Cosmo, 390
Hamlet, 64, 85, 86, 88, 109, 119, 169, 171-173, 180, 193, 222, 225, 332, 337
 Händel, G. F., 240
 Hankin, St John E. C. (1869-1909), his dramatic work, 379, 380-382, 457
 Hardwicke, Sir Cedric, 492
 Hardy, Thomas (1840-1928), 443
Harlequinade, The, 372
Harold, 355
 Hart, Charles (d. 1683), 262
 Harvey, Gabriel (1545-1630), 77
 Harwood, H. M., 465, 470
 Hasenclever, Walther, 447
Hassan, 401-402
 Hastings, B. Macdonald (1881-1928), 390
 Haughton, William (1580?-1602?), 98, 199
 Hauptmann, Gerhart, 346
 Havard, William (1710-78), 268
 Haywood, Eliza (1693-1756), 268
Heartbreak House, 456, 457
Heather Field, The, 417, 418
Heautontimoroumenos, 156
 Hebbel, Frederick, 343, 387
Hecuba, 308
Heimat, Die, 386
 Heminge, William (1602-32?), 195
Henry IV, 122, 126-127, 146, 208, 309
Henry V (Hill), 268
Henry V (Orrery), 231
Henry V (Shakespeare), 208
Henry VI, 205-206
Henry VIII, 209
 Henslowe, Philip, 97; Diary, 71-72, 146, 172, 199
 Herbert, Sir Alan, 471
 Herbert, Sir Henry, 99
Herne's Egg, The, 406
Herod, 400
Herod and Mariamne, 226
Herodes und Mariamne, 343
Heroic Lover, The, 226
 Hewitt, John (fl. 1730), 298
 Heywood, John (1497-1580), 49-51, 65, 214
 Heywood, Thomas (1575?-1648), 108, 112, 113, 117, 119, 197, 199, 201-204, 213, 296, 340, 378
Hibernia Freed, 268
High Tor, 449, 481
 Hilarius, plays by, 23
 Hill, Aaron (1685-1750), 268, 297
Hindle Wakes, 384, 385-386
 Hippisley, John (d. 1748), 277
Hippolytus, 480
His Majesty, 458
His Majesty's Pleasure, 495
Historical Register, The, 274
 Histriones, 18-19
 Hodge, Merton, 465
Hoffman, The Tragedy of, 97, 181
 Holcroft, Thomas (1745-1809), 288
 Home, John (1722-1808), 308, 309, 323, 325
 Homer, Iliad, 178.
Honest Man's Fortune, The, 160
Honest Whore, The, 199-201
Honey Moon, The, 309
 Hood, T. (1799-1845), 425
Horestes, 53
 Horne, Richard Henry (1803-84), 321
 Horniman, Miss, 391
 Houghton, Stanley (1881-1913), 384-386
Hour-glass, The, 409
House, The, 485
House of Aspen, The, 312
 Housman, Laurence, 372, 431, 497
How are they at Home? 487
 Howard, Sir Robert (1626-98), 363; his dramatic work, 226, 245
 Hrotswitha, her plays, 17-18
 Hughes, Thomas (fl. 1587), 61
 Hugo, Victor, 214
Humfrey, Duke of Gloucester, 268
Humorists, The, 244
Humorous Day's Mirth, An, 155
 Humour in Shakespeare, 123
Humour out of Breath, 98
 'Humours,' 93
Hyacinth Halvey, 434
Hyckescorner, 48
Hyde Park, 166
I Have Been Here Before, 487
 Ibsen, Henrik, 356, 357, 488; his importance as dramatic pioneer and his dramatic work, 334, 338-342, 343, 346, 347, 351, 359, 372, 400
Ideal Husband, An, 426, 427
If, 419, 420-421
If Four Walls Told, 464
 Iffland, August Wilhelm, 324
Immortal Lady, The, 491

BRITISH DRAMA

- Impatient Poverty*, 41, 44
Importance of being Earnest, The, 426, 428
Improper Duchess, The, 470
In the Shadow of the Glen, 411, 415, 416, 432
Inca of Perusalem, The, 436
Inchbald, Elizabeth (1753-1821), 280
Inconstant, The, 161, 257
Independent Theatre, 342-343
Indian Emperor, The, 226
Indian Queen, The, 226
Ingannati, Gl', 126
Innocent Usurper, The, 237
Insect Play, The, 449
Interludes, 48-52
Ion, 318, 357
Irene, 264
Iris, 362, 365
Irish Review, The, 495
Iron Chest, The, 326
Isabel's Eleven, 485
Isherwood, Christopher, 482
Island Princess, The, 133
Island Queens, The, 237
Isle of Dogs, The, 75
It Pays to Advertise, 471
Italian drama, influence of, 59-60, 62, 270
Ivan, 317

Jackdaw, The, 434
Jacke Jugeler, 51
Jackson, Sir Barry, 454, 486
James I, characteristics of, 103-104, 174
James IV, 88, 89-90, 205
Jane Clegg, 387-388, 389
Jane Shore, 267
Jealous Comedy, The, 146
Jealous Lovers, The, 143
Jealous Wife, The, 290
Jephson, Robert (1736-1803), 308, 309, 323
Jew, The, 287
Jew of Malta, The, 73, 78, 79, 84, 85, 180
Job, Thomas, 466
Jocasta, 61, 62
Johan, Kyng, 51-52, 63, 205
Johan Baptist, 51
Johan the Evangelist, 42, 44
Johan Johan, 49, 50
John a Kent and John a Cumber, 96
John Bull's Other Island, 441
John Ferguson, 388, 389
John Gladye's Honour, 380

John, King, 207-208
John Woodvil, 312-313
Johnson, Charles (1679-1748), 298
Johnson, Dr Samuel, 264
Johnston, Denis, 399
Johnstone, James (fl. 1789), 324
Jolly, George, 216, 218
Jones, Henry Arthur (1851-1929), 334, 360, 467; his dramatic work, 331, 351-352, 365-367, 379, 425, 428, 457, 467, 468
Jones, Inigo, 107, 211, 212
Jonson, Ben (1573?-1637), 50, 64, 98, 101, 110, 115, 117, 118, 120, 145, 146, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 183, 213, 217, 243, 244, 245, 246, 249, 250; additions to The Spanish Tragedy, 87; his dramatic work, 147-154; masques, 210-211
Joseph and his Brethren, 321
Journey's End, 461
Jouvet, Louis, 449
Jovial Crew, A, 167
Joy, 431
Juarez und Maximilian, 453
Judah, 352, 365
Judas Iscariot, 321
Judith, 343
Julian, 317
Julius Cæsar, 119, 169, 175-176
Juno and the Paycock, 484
Jupiter Laughs, 465
Justice, 370, 371

 KAISER, GEORG, 448, 452
Kate Kennedy, 481
Kean, Edmund, 316
Keats, John (1795-1821), 313, 314, 425
Kelly, Hugh (1739-77), 291, 295; his dramatic work, 286-287
Kelly, John (fl. 1732-41), 284
Kemble, John (1757-1823), 313
Killigrew, Thomas (1612-83), 165, 218
King Charles's Golden Days, 456-457
King Hunger, 449
King Lear's Wife, 477-478, 489
King and the Miller of Mansfield, The, 285
King of Morven, The, 493
King and No King, A, 14, 104, 113, 115, 131-132, 144
King of Nowhere, The, 494
King Sverre, 344

INDEX

- King Victor and King Charles*, 319-320
King's Daughter, A, 403
King's Threshold, The, 409
Kingdom of Youth, The, 397
Kismet, 402
Kiss for Cinderella, A, 422
Knight of the Burning Pestle, The, 120
Knight of Malta, The, 184
Knights, The, 290
 Knoblock, Edward (1874-1945), 402
 Knowles, James Sheridan (1784-1862), 317
 Kotzebue, A. F. F. von, 293, 309, 324, 325
 Kratter, Franz, 324
Krishna Kumari, 495
 Kyd, Thomas (1557?-95?), 62, 73, 98, 120, 122, 172; career of, 74; dramatic work of, 86-88
 Kynaston, Edward, 262

 LABICHE, EUGÈNE M., 350
Laburnum Grove, 487
 Lacy, John (fl. 1660-85), 246; his dramatic work, 245
Lady Alimony, 165
Lady Inger of Ostråt, 339
Lady Jane Gray, 267
Lady of Belmont, The, 458, 489
Lady of Lyons, The, 331
Lady of Pleasure, The, 166
Lady Patricia, 431
Lady Windermere's Fan, 426-427
Lady with a Lamp, The, 485
Lady's Last Stake, The, 282
Lady's Trial, The, 140-141
 Lamb, Charles (1775-1834), 337, 425; his dramatic work, 312-313
Lancelot, 495
Land, The, 397-398
Land of Heart's Desire, The, 409, 417, 423
Land of Promise, The, 468
 Landor, Robert Eyres (1781-1869), 317-318
 Landor, Walter Savage (1775-1864), 317
Laodice and Danaë, 477
Last of the De Mullins, The, 380, 381
Last of Mrs Cheyney, The, 470
Last Trump, The, 494
 Laud, Archbishop, 105
Laughter of the Gods, The, 419
Law of Lombardy, The, 308
 Lawrence, W. J., The Shakespearian Playhouse, 337

Lear, King, 111, 114, 119, 138, 139, 169, 173, 174-175, 188, 220, 222, 225, 310, 369
 Lee Nathaniel (1653?-92), 231-232
Leir, King, 63
 Lenormand, Henri-René, 449
Leonarda, 344
 Leslie, Shane, 495
 Lessing, G. F., 323, 324
Letter, The, 468
Letty, 365
 Levy, Benn, 464
 Lewis, Matthew Gregory (1775-1818), 328
Liars, The, 428, 467
 Licensing Act (1737), 259
Life of Man, The, 449
Lifting, The, 493
Light Comedian, The, 465
Light of Heart, The, 465
Likes of Her, The, 365, 459
Lilies of the Field, The, 470
 Lillo, George (1693-1739), 267, 297-298, 307, 309, 340
 Lindsay, Jack, 474, 475
Lionel and Clarissa, 278
Lithuania, 298
Little French Lawyer, The, 161
Little Man, The, 431
Little Minister, The, 421-422
Little Plays of St Francis, 497
Live Corpse, The, 345-346
Living Room, 466
Locrine, 62
 Lodge, Sir Oliver, 378
 Lodge, Thomas (1558?-1625), university career of, 73; Rosalynde, 74, 125; dramatic work of, 74-75
 Logeman, H., edition of Elckerlijck, 43 n.
London Assurance, 331
London Merchant, The, 204, 297
London Wall, 460
Lonesome-like, 432
 Lonsdale, Frederick, 470
Look about You, 96-97
Looking-glass for London and England, A, Lodge's share in, 74-75; Greene's share in, 88
 Lope de Vega, 119
Lost Lady, The, 143
Lost Leader, The, 394, 395
Love and a Bottle, 257
Love and Honour, 142
Love for Love, 254-255
Love in a Wood, 252
Love in Several Masques, 273
Love on the Dole, 465

BRITISH DRAMA

- Love's Cruelty*, 193-194
Love's Labour Lost, 122, 123-124
Love's Last Shift, 281
Love's Metamorphosis, 91
Love's Sacrifice, 191, 192
Lover's Melancholy, The, 191
Lower Depths, The, 346
Loyalties, 368, 371, 458
Lucian, 51
Ludus Coventriæ, 29
Luria, 320
Lust's Dominion, 78
Lyceum Theatre, 338, 346, 400
Lying Lover, The, 283
Lyly, John (1554?-1606), 51, 52, 94, 122; university career of, 73; Euphues, 74, 92; dramatic work, 91-94
Lyndsay, Sir David (1480-1555), 45-46
Lyric Theatre, Hammersmith, 471

Macbeth, 80, 85, 119, 169, 173-174, 191, 206, 222, 238
McCracken, Esther, 466
McEvoy, Charles (1879-1929), 365, 390, 459, 460
Machiavelli, Niccolò, 184; influence on Marlowe, 79
Machine drama, Russian and Continental, 448, 449
Machines, 485
Mackenzie, Henry, The Man of Feeling, 279
Mackenzie, Ronald, 465
MacLeish, Archibald, 453, 481
Macpherson, Ossian, 308
Macready, W. C., 319
MacSwiny, Owen, 239
Madam Fickle, 249
Madras House, The, 372, 375, 444
Maeterlinck, Maurice, 214, 346, 400, 446, 448
Maeve, 417-418
Magistrate, The, 350
Magnetic Lady, The, 148
Magnificence, 44-45
Magnin, Charles, Le Théâtre de Roswitha, 17 n.
Maid in the Mill, The, 134
Maid of Bath, The, 290
Maid of Honour, The, 116, 117, 138
Maid of the Mill, The, 278
Maid's Revenge, The, 193
Maid's Tragedy, The, 109, 115, 116, 182
Major Barbara, 440
Malleon, Miles, 469
Mallet, David (1705?-65), 266-267

Malvern Festival, 454-455, 492
Man and Superman, 358, 438-440, 442-443
Man in Possession, The, 470
Man of Destiny, The, 434, 438
Man of Mode, The, 251-252
Man who ate the Popomack, The, 485-486
Man with a Load of Mischief, The, 492
Mandragola, 492
Manfred, 314, 315
Mango Island, 484
Mankind, 43
Manners, J. Hartley (1870-1928), 471
Mannyng, Robert, Handling Sin, 24
Manuel, 316
Manuel des Pechiez, 24
Margery, 277
Maria Magdalena, 343, 387
Mariners, 459
Marinetti, F., 452
Marino Faliero, 314
Marlowe, Christopher (1564-93), 52, 90, 93, 94, 122, 179, 205, 206, 315, 321; university career of, 73; dramatic work of, 78-86, 334, 473
Marmion, Shackerley (1603-39), 165
Marriage à la Mode, 247
Marriage has been Arranged, A, 428
Marriage of Columbine, The, 430
Married in Haste, 349
Married Philosopher, The, 284
Marrying of Ann Leete, The, 372, 374
Marston, John (1575?-1634), 117, 152, 154; his dramatic work, 172-173
Martyn, Benjamin (1699-1763), 266
Martyn, Edward (1859-1923), 417-418, 421
Marvell, Andrew (1621-78), 102
Mary Broome, 430
Mary Queen of Scots, 268
Mary Rose, 359, 423
Mary Stuart (Drinkwater), 490
Mary Stuart in Scotland, 344
Masefield, John, and his dramatic work, 359, 376-379, 402-403, 434; The Daffodil Fields, 376; Reynard the Fox, 376
Masque of Blackness, 211
Masque of Queens, 211
Masque of Venice, The, 496
Masqueraders, The, 366
Masques, 210-212
Massacre at Paris, The, 78
Massacre of the Innocents, The, 39

INDEX

- Masse-Mensch*, 448, 452, 453, 483
Massinger, Philip (1583-1640), 101, 108, 109, 111, 112, 114, 115, 116, 120, 135 n., 188, 213, 214, 267; his dramatic work, 137-138, 162, 163, 188-190; collaboration with Fletcher, 159-161, 183
Master-builder, The, 400
Masuccio, 128
Match at Midnight, A, 164
Maturin, Charles Robert (1782-1824), 316
Maugham, W. Somerset, 360, 467-469
Maurice Harte, 396
May Day, 155, 157
May Lady, 210
Mayne, Jasper (1604-72), 164-165
Mayor of Quinborough, The, 108, 139
Measure for Measure, 127, 130-131, 135
Medwall, Henry (fl. 1486), 44, 49, 53
Megrue, Roi Cooper, 471
Meilhac, Henri, 334
Melloney Holts spur, 376, 378, 379
Melodrama, 323-333, 452
Menschenhass und Reue, 324
Merchant of Venice, The, 122, 127-129, 489
Meres, Francis (fl. 1598), 96
Merry Wives of Windsor, The, 122, 127, 146-147, 164, 208
Michael and his Lost Angel, 366
Michael and Mary, 463
Microcosmus, 108
Mid-Channel, 362, 365
Midas, 91
Middleton, Thomas (1570?-1627), 101, 108, 109, 112, 113, 114, 117, 158, 213; his dramatic work, 138-140, 163, 190-191
Midsummer Eve, 477
Midsummer Madness, 491
Midsummer Night's Dream, A, 51, 89, 96, 122, 124-125, 130, 147, 216
Mikado, The, 354
Milestones, 386, 390
Milman, Henry Hart, 316
Milne, A. A., 429, 462-464
Milton, John, 101, 211; Paradise Lost, 227
Mind, Will and Understanding, 44
'Mind-the-Paint' Girl, The, 365
Minna von Barnhelm, 324
Minor, The, 290
Minuet, The, 431
Miracle, The, 452
Miracle plays—see Mystery plays
Miseries of Enforced Marriage, The, 135, 199
Misfortunes of Arthur, The, 61-62
Miss Julie, 345
Mr Bolfray, 495
Mr Pepys, 491
Mr Pim Passes By, 464
Mrs Dane's Defence, 366
Mrs Dot, 468
Mrs Gorrings's Necklace, 429
Mrs Harrison, 378
Mrs Moonlight, 464
Mrs Warren's Profession, 373, 437
Mitford, Mary Russell (1787-1855), 317
Mixed Marriage, 387, 389, 461
Mob, The, 368, 371
Moffat, Graham, 431-432
Mohocks, The, 272
Mohun, Major Michael, 221, 262
Molière, 224, 245, 249, 258
Mollusc, The, 429
Moncrieff, William Thomas (1794-1857), 328
Money, 331
Monkhouse, Allan N. (1858-1936), 430-431, 461, 462
Monsieur de Pourceaugnac, 258
Monsieur D'Olive, 155, 156
Moon in the Yellow River, The, 399
Moore, Edward (fl. 1748-53), 287-288, 298
Morality plays, 41-48
More, Sir Thomas, 49, 50
More, Sir Thomas, 96
Morgan, Charles, 487
Morning Star, The, 465
Morton, Thomas (fl. 1792-1807), 325
Moscow Art Theatre, 446
Mother Bombie, 91, 92-93, 94 n.
Motteux, Pierre-Antoine, 239
Moulton, Richard G., 337
Mournful Nuptials, The, 298
Much Ado about Nothing, 122, 127, 129-130, 131
Munday, Anthony (1553-1633), 96-97, 152
Munro, C. K., 429, 452, 470, 483, 484
Murder in the Cathedral, 481
Murphy, Arthur (1727-1805), his dramatic work, 291
Murray, T. C., 392; his dramatic work, 396-397
Music at Night, 487
Music room in Elizabethan theatres, 70

BRITISH DRAMA

Musical Chairs, 465-466
 Mussolini, Benito, 453
Mustapha (Mallet), 266-267
Mustapha (Orrery), 231
Mystère du Vieil Testament, 32, 39
Mysterious Mother, The, 308
 Mystery plays, 24-40

 NABBES, THOMAS (1605-41?), 108
Nan, The Tragedy of, 357, 359, 376-378, 379, 389, 402
Napoleon, 453
 Nashe, Thomas (1567-1601), university career of, 74; Jacke Wilton, 74; dramatic work of, 75
Nature, 44
Nature of the Four Elements, The, 49
Necromantia, 51
Nero, 196
Nero (Lee), 232
Nero (Phillips), 400
Nest of Plays, The, 198
New Morality, The, 469
New Sin, The, 390
New Way to Pay Old Debts, A, 162
Newcastle-on-Tyne, mystery play from, 29
Newly Married Couple, The, 344
Nibelungen, Die, 343
Nice Valour, 161
Nietzsche, F., 340
Night at an Inn, A, 419-420
Night Must Fall, 465
 Nō drama, Japanese influence of, 402, 403, 477
No Room at the Inn, 466
Nocturne in Palermo, 491
 Northampton, mystery play from, 29
Northern Lass, The, 167
Northward Ho, 158
 Norton, Thomas (fl. 1560), 61
 Norwich, mystery play from, 29
Notorious Mrs Ebbsmith, The, 362, 364-365

 O'CASEY, SEAN, 461, 483-484, 486, 494
O'Dowd, The, 332
Œdipus Tyrannus (Shelley), 425
Offence, The, 464
Oiseau bleu, L', 446
Old Adam, The, 458
Old Acquaintance, 461
Old Batchelor, The, 254
Old Fortunatus, 137, 157
Old King Cole, 491
Old Lady shows her Medals, The, 444

Old Law, The, 163
Old Music, 465
Old Troop, The, 245
 'Old Vic' theatre, 337
Old Wives' Tale, The, 75, 77-78
 Oldfield, Anne, 221, 262
Oliver Cromwell, 490
Olympic Revels, 332-333
One of Them, 379
Only round the Corner, 351
 Opera, 238-241
Opportunity, The, 142
Orators, The, 290
 O'Riordan, Conal, 495
Orlando Furioso, 88, 89, 99
Oroonoko, 296
Orphan, The, 204, 233-234, 236, 242, 296, 297
Osorio, 311. See also Remorse
 Ossian, 308
Othello, 64, 80, 111, 115, 119, 138, 169, 173-174, 221, 225, 304, 369
Otho the Great, 313
 Otway, Thomas (1652-85), 224, 242, 263, 267, 271, 296, 307; his heroic tragedies, 232-233; his blank-verse dramas, 233-234, 459
 Ould, Hermon, 465, 486
Our Betters, 360, 469
Our Town, 449
Ours, 347
Outward Bound, 496-497

 PAGEANTS, 25-26
Pair of Spectacles, A, 350
Palace of Truth, The, 353
 Palsgrave, J. (d. 1554), 51
Panic, 481
Pantaloon, 424
 Pantomime, 269-271
Paolo and Francesca, 400, 401
Paphnutius, 18
Pardoner and the Friar, The, 49, 50
 Parker, Louis Napoleon, 431
Parson's Wedding, The, 165
Pasquin, 274-276
Patience, 354, 426
Patriots, The, 394
Paul Clifford, 329
 Peacey, Howard, 495-496
Pecorone, Il, 127
 Peele, George (1558?-97), 92, 94, 97, 122, 205; university career, of 74; Merry Conceited Jestes, 74; dramatic work of, 75-78
Peg o' my Heart, 471
Pelléas et Mélisande, 346, 446
Penelope, 468

INDEX

- Pepys, Samuel, 219
 Percy, Edward, 464
Pericles, 133, 135-136, 143, 159
Perkin Warbeck, 209
Perplexed Husband, The, 429
Peter Pan, 421, 422
Petits oiseaux, Les, 350
Philanderer, The, 436
Philaster, 188
Philip the King, 403
 Philips, Ambrose (1675?-1749), 264, 268
 Phillips, F. C. (1850-1921), 352
 Phillips, Stephen (1868-1915), 474;
 his dramatic work, 400-401, 402, 447
 Phillips, Capt. William (fl. 1722), 268
 Phillpotts, Eden, 432
Philosopher of Butterbiggins, The, 430
Phœnix (Abercrombie), 475, 476
Phœnix, The (Middleton), 163
Physician, The, 366
 Pickeryng, John, 53
Pigeon, The, 368, 371
 Pilcher, Velona, 486
Pilgrim, The, 133
 Pinero, Sir Arthur Wing (1855-1934), 352, 367; his dramatic work, 350-351, 356, 362-365, 379, 425, 429, 458
Pippa Passes, 319, 320
 Pirandello, Luigi, 449
Pirates of Penzance, The, 354
 Pistoja, Bonaccorso da, 53
 Pitoeff, Georges, 449
Pizarro, 293, 325
Plain Dealer, The, 252-254, 360
 Planché, James Robinson (1796-1880), 332-333
 Plato, 425
Platonic Lovers, The, 142
 Plautus, 17, 51, 94
Play of Love, A, 49
Play of the Weather, The, 49-50
Playboy of the Western World, The, 411, 416, 432-433
 Playfair, Sir Nigel, 449, 471
Playhouse to be Let, The, 198
Plays for Puritans, 443
Plays on the Passions, 310-311
Plays Pleasant and Unpleasant, 443
 Plutarch, 177
Poetaster, 148, 153-154, 158
Polite Satires, 491
 Politician, The, 194
 Politics in seventeenth-century drama, 116
Polly, 272-273
Polly Honeycombe, 290
Pomander Walk, 431
 Pope, Alexander (1688-1744), 263, 264, 308
 Pordage, Samuel (b. 1673), 226
 Porter, Henry (fl. 1599), 98
Portrait of a Gentleman in Slippers, 464
Possession, 497
Pot of Broth, The, 433
Poverty and Wealth, 324
Power of Darkness, The, 345
 Preston, Thomas (1537-98), 53
Price of Coal, The, 386
Price of Thomas Scott, The, 383, 384
Pride of Life, The, 44
Pride's Cure, 313
 Priestley, J. B., 487
Princesse Maleine, La, 346
Prisoners of War, The, 462
 'Private' theatres, 67-68, 107
 Professional actors, influence of, 41
Profligate, The, 351, 363
Progress, 483
Prometheus Unbound, 313
Promos and Cassandra, 52-53, 57, 64
 Properties in Elizabethan theatres, 68, 72-73
Prophetess, The, 133, 240
Provoked Wife, The, 258
Prunella, 372, 431
 Prynne, W. (1600-69), Histriomastix, 211
 'Public' theatres, 67-68
 Purcell, Henry (1658?-95), 224, 239
 Puritans react to Cavalier abandon, 104; suppress the theatres, 215-218
Pygmalion and Galatea, 353-354
Quality Street, 423
Queen Mary, 355
Queene of Arragon, The, 108, 143
Queen's Enemies, The, 419
Quem Quæritis, 21
Quest of Elizabeth, The, 444n., 453, 484
 RACINE, JEAN, 231, 264, 376
 Raleigh, Sir Walter, 102, 152
 Randolph, Thomas (1605-35), 143, 145
Rape of Lucrece, The, 112

BRITISH DRAMA

- Rastell, John, 49
Rat Trap, The, 470
Rats of Norway, The, 465
 Rattigan, Terence, 466, 471
Räuber, Die, 312, 315, 323
 Ravenscroft, Edward (fl. 1673-97), 261; his dramatic work, 248-249
 Rawlins, Thomas (1620?-70), 143
 Reade, Charles, 330
Rebellion (Drinkwater), 403, 404
Rebellion, The (Rawlins), 143
Recruiting Officer, The, 257-258
 Redford, John, 42
 Reed, A. W., 49-50
Refusal, The, 282
Regicide, The, 268
Rehearsal, The, 225, 273
Relapse, The, 257, 258
Remorse, 310, 311, 312
Renegado, The, 137-138
Respublica, 42, 46-47
Return of the Druses, The, 319, 320
Return of the Prodigal, The, 380, 381
Return of the Soldier, The, 460-461
Revenge of Bussy D'Ambois, The, 181
Revenger's Tragedy, The, 185-186
 Rice, Elmer, 448
Richard II, 122, 206-207
Richard III, 122, 206
 Richardson, Samuel, Pamela, 279
Riders to the Sea, 359, 403, 411-413, 416, 432
Riding to Lithend, The, 477
Rival Brothers, The, 297
Rival Kings, The, 237
Rival Ladies, The, 246
Rivals, The, 290, 293-294
Road to Ruin, The, 288, 299
Roaring Girl, The, 114, 117, 158, 159
Robbers, The, 325
Robert, Earl of Huntingdon, 96
Robert E. Lee, 490
 Robertson, J. M., 208
 Robertson, T. W. (1829-71), 352, 426; his dramatic work, 334, 347-349
 Robinson, Lennox, his dramatic work, 392, 394-396, 397, 433, 435, 489
Rogue's Comedy, The, 468
Roister Doister, 58-59, 65
Roman Actor, The, 109, 112, 115, 188-189
 Romantic comedy in Peele, 77-78; in Greene, 89-90; in Lyly, 91-92; in Shakespeare, 122-135. See also Comedy and Tragi-comedy
- Romeo and Juliet*, 107, 119, 122, 169, 170-171, 207, 233, 309
 Rose, the, theatre, 67
Rose without a Thorn, The, 491
Rosmersholm, 359
 Rostand, E., 448
Round Table, The, 392
 Rousseau, Jean-Jacques, 280
Rover, The, 248
 Rowe, Nicholas (1674-1718), 237, 268, 307; his dramatic work, 267-268, 307
 Rowley, Samuel (1580?-1633), 98, 99, 109, 113, 114, 209
 Rowley, William (1585?-1642?), 134, 135; his dramatic work, 138-140, 163-164, 196
Royal Slave, The, 143
 Rubinstein, H. F., 465, 485
Rugged Path, The, 399
Rule a Wife and Have a Wife, 309
Rumour, The, 452, 483, 484
 'Runs' of plays, 336
R.U.R., 449
 Russell, G. W. ("Æ"), 413
Rutherford and Son, 359, 383-384, 390
 Rutter, Joseph (fl. 1635), 145
 Rymer, Thomas (1641-1713), 225
- SACKVILLE, THOMAS, Earl of Dorset (1536-1608), 61
Sad Shepherd, The, 145
 Sadler's Wells, theatre, 337, 452
 Saint-Denis, M., 449
Saint Joan, 456, 457, 489
 St John, Christopher; translation of Hrotswitha's plays by, 17 n.
 St John, John (fl. 1789), 268
St Mary Magdalene, 39
Saints and Sinners, 351-352, 365, 367, 428
 Saintsbury, George, 244
Sale of St Thomas, The, 476
 Salisbury Court, theatre, 67, 108, 216
Salmacida Spolia, 211-212
Salome, 426
 Salzburg, dramatic festival at, 455
Sappho and Phao, 91
Sapientia, 18
Sardanapalus, 314, 315
 Sardou, Victorien, 362, 391
Satire of the Three Estates, A, 45-46, 48
Satiromastix, 158
Sauny the Scott, 245

INDEX

- Savory, Gerald, 471
 Savoy Operas, the, 353
 Sayers, D. L., 481, 482
 Scenery in Elizabethan theatres, 72; in Restoration theatres, 220-221
Schiffbrüchig, 468
 Schiller, J. C. F., 309, 312, 323, 325
 Schlegel, A. W. von, 118
School for Greybeards, A, 291
School for Scandal, The, 294-295
School for Scheming, The, 331
School for Wives, The, 286
School of Compliment, The, 165
Schoolmistress, The, 350
 Schücking, F., 111, 128 n.
Scornful Lady, The, 160
 Scott, Clement, 356
 Scott, Sir Walter (1771-1832), 304, 305, 306, 316, 328, 437; his dramatic work, 312; Waverley, 312; Rob
 Roy, 328
 Scottish Community Drama Association, 454, 480, 494
 Scottish National Theatre, 494
Scrape o' the Pen, A, 432
 Scribe, Eugène, 362
Sea Voyage, The, 133-134
Seagull, The, 345
Searcher, The, 486
Second Maiden's Tragedy, The, 196
Second Mrs Tanqueray, The, 351,
 362, 364, 365
Second Round, The, 465
Secret Life, The, 458
Secret Love, 143, 246-247, 252
Secunda Pastorum (Wakefield cycle), 36
Sejanus, 64
 Selver, Paul, 449
 Seneca, 14, 16-17, 53, 60-63, 86-88, 180
 Sentimentalism in the seventeenth century, 113-115; in the eighteenth century, 279-289
 Settle, Elkanah (1648-1724), 226,
 239; his dramatic work, 230
 Sex themes in modern drama, 341,
 372-375
Shadow and Substance, 487
Shadow of a Gunman, The, 484
Shadow of the Glen, The, 411, 415,
 416, 432
Shadowy Waters, The, 409
 Shadwell, Thomas (1640-92), 238,
 248, 261, 281; his dramatic work,
 243-245
 Shaip, Mordaunt, 464
 Shakespeare, William (1564-1616),
 13, 28, 29, 51, 58, 61, 63, 64, 65,
 78, 80, 84, 85, 86, 90, 93, 94, 95,
 96, 97, 100, 101 106, 109, 110,
 111, 117, 118, 119, 138, 182, 183,
 191, 193, 197, 214, 216, 217, 225,
 227, 228, 233, 236, 243, 263, 264,
 268, 271, 293, 304, 307, 308, 309,
 332, 337, 341, 425, 473, 477-478;
 his romantic comedies, 122-131;
 share in Two Noble Kinsmen,
 134; romantic tragi-comedies,
 135-136; realistic comedies, 146-
 147, 489; tragedies, 169-179, 372,
 438; chronicle histories, 205-208
Shall We Join the Ladies? 423
Shaughraun, The, 332
 Shaw, George Bernard, 343, 358, 360, 361, 367, 391, 432, 457, 467;
 his dramatic work, 360-361, 373,
 432, 434, 435-445, 447, 456-458,
 467, 472, 489
She Stoops to Conquer, 293
She Would and She Would Not,
 282
She Would if She Could, 251-252
 Sheil, Richard Lalor (1791-1851), 316
 Shelley, Percy Bysshe (1792-1822),
 309, 425; his dramatic work, 313-
 314
Shepherd's Holiday, The, 145
 Sheridan, Richard Brinsley (1751-1816), 301, 312; his dramatic work, 276-277, 277-278, 293-295,
 325, 428
 Sheriff, R. C., 461
Shewing-up of Blanco Posnet, The, 440
 Shiels, George, 399
Shining Hour, The, 465
Ship, The, 389
 Shirley, James (1596-1666), 101,
 102, 106, 115, 138, 140, 155, 157,
 196, 211, 213, 316; his dramatic work, 141-142, 145, 165-166, 191,
 193-195
 Shirley, William (fl. 1750), 268
Shoemaker a Gentleman, A, 163-164
Shoemakers' Holiday, The, 157-158, 160
 Siddons, Mrs, 261, 301
 Sidney, Sir Philip (1554-86), 57,
 102, 210
Siege of Ancona, The, 317
Siege of Rhodes, The, 212, 217, 238, Sigurd the Bad, 344

- Silver Box, The*, 368, 370-371
Silver King, The, 331, 351
Silver Tassie, The, 461, 483-484
Sin of David, The, 400
Sir Courtly Nice, 248
Sir Hercules Buffoon, 245
Sir Patient Fancy, 248
Six Characters in Search of an Author, 449
 Sitwell, Edith, 474
 Skelton, John (1460-1529), 44-45
Skin Game, The, 368
Skin of Our Teeth, The, 449
Slice of Life, A, 421
 Smith, 468
 Smollett, Tobias George (1721-71), 268, 329
Society, 334, 347, 348
 Socrates, 491
Socrates, 491
Sohn, Der, 447
 Soliloquy in Elizabethan drama, 69; in the nineteenth century, 349
 Sophocles, 14, 15, 180
Sophonisba (Lee), 232
Sophonisba (Thomson), 265-266
 Sorge, Reinhard, 447
 Sotheby, William (1757-1833), 317
Soul's Tragedy, A, 320
 Southerne, Thomas (1660-1746), 296
 Southey, Robert (1774-1843), 311
Sovereign Love, 396
 Sowerby, Githa, and her dramatic work, 359, 383-384, 390
Sowing the Wind, 350
Spanish Gipsy, The, 109, 111, 139, 140
Spanish Tragedy, The, 62, 86-88, 94, 111, 120, 172, 180, 192
 Spectacle in early seventeenth-century theatres, 108-109
Speed the Plough, 325
 Spender, Stephen, 482
 Spenser, Edmund, 101, 102, 217
Spiritata, La, 60
Sponsus, 23
Spook Sonata, The, 446
Spreading the News, 434
Spring, 396
Spring Cleaning, 470
Spring in Bloomsbury, 432
Spring 1600, 471
Squire, The, 350
Squire of Alsatia, The, 244
Squire Trelooby, 258
 Staging in the sixteenth century, 66-68
Staircase, The, 475
 Stanislavski, Constantin, 446
Staple of News, The, 148
State of Innocence, The, 227
 Steele, Sir Richard (1672-1729), 114, 263, 279-284; dramatic work, 282-284, 325; The Christian Hero, 282
Still Waters Run Deep, 331
Storm (Munro), 429
Storm, The (Drinkwater), 403
Strafford, 319
 Strafford, Thomas, Earl of, 105
Street Scene, 452
Strife, 368, 371, 461
 Strindberg, August, 345, 446
 Strobe, W. C., 466
Stroller's Packet Opened, The, 216
 Stuart, Aimée, 465
 Stuart, Philip, 465
Success, 464
 Suckling, Sir John (1609?-42), 108, 195-196, 363
 Sudermann, Hermann, 386
Sullen Lovers, The, 244
 Sullivan, Sir A. S. (1842-1900), 278, 353-355
 Sully, J., 123 n.
Summer's Last Will and Testament, 75
Summit, The, 399
 Sunderland, Scott, 492
Supposes, 59
Suppositi, I, 59
 Surrey Theatre, 452
Susannah and the Elders, 495
Suscitatio Lazari, 23
 Sutro, Alfred (1863-1933), dramatic works, 379-380, 428-429
 Swan, the, theatre, 67
Swan Song, The, 345
Sweet Lavender, 350
 Swift, Jonathan (1667-1745), 101
Switchback, The, 494
 Sykes, Dugdale, 99
 Synge, John Millington (1871-1909), 391, 392, 397, 406, 410-417, 484, 494; his dramatic work, 359, 403, 410-417, 425, 432-435, 446
Tale of a Tub, A, 148
 Talfourd, Sir Thomas Noon (1795-1854), 318
Tamburlaine the Great, 72, 73, 74, 78, 80, 81, 82, 84, 85, 89, 107, 111
Tamerlane, 267
Taming of a Shrew, The, 99, 146
Taming of the Shrew, The, 117, 122, 146, 159, 309

INDEX

- Tancred and Gismund*, 61-62
Tancred and Sigismunda, 265-266
Tantivy Towers, 471
 Tasso, Torquato, 145
 Tate, Nahum (1652-1715), 261; his dramatic work, 248-249
 Taverner, W. (d. 1731), 284
 Taylor, Tom (1817-80), 330, 331
 Tchechov, Anton, 345
Tempest, The, 71, 106, 133, 135-136, 210, 222, 238, 240, 304
 Temple, Joan, 466, 495
Temple of Love, The, 212 n.
Tempter, The, 366
Tender Husband, The, 283
 Tennyson, Alfred, Lord (1809-92), 304, 425; his dramatic work, 354-355
Tenth Man, The, 468
 Terence, 17, 92, 94; influence on Middle Ages, 18-19; influence on sixteenth-century drama, 53, 58, 59, 60; influence on Jonson, 149
 Theatre, first 'public,' 66
 Theatre Act (1843), 330, 335
Theatre of the Soul, The, 449
 Théâtre Libre, the, 344-345
 Theobald, Lewis, 271
Theodosius, 232
There are Crimes and Crimes, 345
Thersytes, 49
They Came to a City, 487
Thierry and Theodoret, 183-184
 Thomas, Berte, 372
 Thomas Muskerry, 397, 398-399
 Thompson, Edward, 495
 Thompson, Francis, 474
 Thomson, James (1700-48), his dramatic work, 265-266; The Seasons, 265-266
Thread o' Scarlet, 389
Three Ladies of London, The, 98
Three Laws, 51
Three Lords and Three Ladies of London, The, 98-99
Thunderbolt, The, 365
Thyestes, 61
Ticket-of-leave Man, The, 331
Time and the Conways, 487
Times, The, 362, 364
Timoleon, 266
Timon of Athens, 169
Tinker's Wedding, The, 434
'Tis Pity, 191, 193
Titus Andronicus, 72 n, 107, 112, 169, 170
To Have the Honour, 464
To See Ourselves, 465
To-morrow, 462
Tobias and the Angel, 494
 Tobin, John (1770-1804), 309
 Toller, Ernst, 447, 448, 452, 453
 Tolstoi, Count Leo, 345
Tom Cobb, 354
Tom Thumb, 273
Too True to be Good, 435, 456, 457
 Tourneur, Cyril (fl. 1610), 112, 213; his dramatic work, 185-187
Towie Castle, 480
Town before You, The, 291
Town Fop, The, 248
 "Townley" mystery plays—see Wakefield
Tragedia del libero Arbitrio, 51
Tragedy of Pompey the Great, The, 402-403, 434
 Tragedy, pseudo-classical, in sixteenth century, 60-62; Marlowe's idea of, 82-86; Kyd's idea of, 86-88; domestic, 95, 119, 197-204, 296-300, 307, 323, 356-399; horror elements in, 108-111, 119; 188-196; revenge type, 180-187, heroic, 223-233; pseudo-classical, in eighteenth century, 263-268
 Tragi-comedy, 52-57, 112-113, 122-145
Traitor, The, 193-195
 Trapp, Dr Joseph, 266
 Trevelyan, H. B., 462
Trial of a Judge, The, 482
Trial of Jesus, The, 403
Trick to Catch the Old One, A, 163
Tristan and Isolt, 403
Trip to Scarborough, A, 294
Trip to Scotland, A, 289
Triumph of Peace, The, 211
Triumph of the Philistines, The, 366
Triumphs of the Prince d'Amour, The, 212 n.
Troilus and Cressida (Dryden), 235
Troilus and Cressida (Shakespeare), 169, 176, 178, 438
 Tropes, 21
Troublesome Reign of John, King of England, The, 63, 207
True Tragedy of Richard Duke of York, The, 63
Truth about the Russian Dancers, The, 422
Tryphon, 231
Tumbledown Dick, 274
 Turgenev, Ivan, 390
 Turner, J. Hastings, 470
 Turner, W. J., 485-486
Twelfth Night, 51, 122, 126, 147, 309

BRITISH DRAMA

- Twin Rivals, The*, 257
Two Angry Women of Abingdon, The, 98
Two Foscari, The, 314
Two Gentlemen of Verona, The, 122, 124
Two Hundred a Year, 350
Two Lamentable Tragedies, 199
Two Loves and a Life, 330
Two Mr Wetherbys, The, 380-381
Two Noble Kinsmen, The, 134
Two Roses, 349
Tyl Ulenspiegel, 492
Tyrannic Love, 226
Tyranny of Tears, The, 379
- UDALL, NICHOLAS (1506-56), 58
Ulysses, 400
Uncle Harry, 466
Uncle Vanya, 345
Unhappy Favourite, The, 237
 University Wits—see Greene, Kyd, Lodge, Lyly, Marlowe, Nashe, Peele Unnatural Combat, The, 188-189
Up Stream, 491
 Urban IV, Pope, 25
 Ustinov, Peter, 466
- VACHTANGOV, E., 446
Valentinian, 112, 115, 188
 Van Druten, John, 460-461, 497
 Vanbrugh, Sir John (1664-1726), 243, 259, 279; his dramatic work, 257-258
 Vane, Sutton, 496-497
 Vaughan, Professor, 84, 341
Venetian, The, 491
Venice Preserved, 233, 234, 242, 459
Vera, 426
Versunkene Glocke, Die, 346
Vestal Virgin, The, 363
 Vice, character of the, in medieval drama, 48; influence of, 59
Viceroy Sarah, 497
Victoria Regina, 497
Vie Parisienne, La, 471
 Villiers, George, Duke of Buckingham (1627-88), 225
Virgin Goddess, The, 401
Virgin Martyr, The, 108, 112, 115, 116, 188, 189-190
Virginus, 317, 357
Virtue Betrayed, 237
Virtuoso, The, 244
 Volder, Wilhelm de, 51
Volpone, 148, 154
Volunteers, The, 244
- Vor Sonnenaufgang*, 346
Voysey Inheritance, The, 372, 373, 374, 375, 390
- WAKEFIELD mystery cycle, 29, 35-38
Walls of Jericho, The, 428
 Walpole, Horace, 308
Waltzes from Vienna, 452
Wandlung, Die, 447
Warning for Fair Women, A, 199
Warren Hastings, 496
Waste, 357, 372, 374
Wat Tyler, 311
Way of the World, The, 254, 255, 360
Way to Keep Him, The, 291
Weaker Sex, The, 350-351, 363, 365, 429
Weakest goeth to the Wall, The, 96
Wealth and Health, 41, 42, 44
Weather Hen, The, 372
 Webb, John, 212
Weber, Die, 346
 Webster, Benjamin Nottingham (1797-1882), 329
 Webster, John (fl. 1620), 101, 104, 112, 115, 158, 213; his dramatic work, 184-185
Well of the Saints, The, 411, 416
 Wells, Charles Jeremiah (1800-79), 320, 321
 Werfel, Franz, 453
Werner, 314, 315
West Indian, The, 287, 288
 West, Rebecca, 460
Westward Ho, 158
What d'Ye Call It, The, 272
What Every Woman Knows, 423, 424
Wheel o' Fortune, The, 396
Wheel of Fortune, The, 287
When You See Me, You Know Me, 99, 209
 Whetstone, George, 52-53
 Whistler, James M., 428
White Château, The, 453, 484, 485
White Cockade, The, 434
White Devil, The, 184
White Horse Inn, The, 452, 453
 Whitehead, William (1715-85), 289
Whiteheaded Boy, The, 394, 433
Widow, The, 109, 113, 163
Widowers' Houses, 435, 437, 466
Widow's Tears, The, 155, 157
Wife, The, 317
Wild Duck, The, 339, 342, 400
Wild Gallant, The, 246
Wild-geese Chase, The, 161

INDEX

- Wilde, Oscar (1856-1900), 426, 434,
 467, 468; his comedies, 386, 391,
 426-428
 Wilder, Thornton, 449
 Wildgans, Anton, 447
 Wilkins, George (fl. 1605-8), 135
Will, The, 423
Will Shakespeare, 383, 489
William Tell, 317
 Williams, Emlyn, 465, 471
 Willis, Ted, 466
 Wilmot, John, Earl of Rochester
 (1648-80), 102
 Wilmot, Robert (1550?-91?), 61
 Wilson, Charles Henry (d. 1808), 324
 Wilson, John (fl. 1664-70), 245
 Wilson, Robert (1560?-93?), 98
Wily Beguiled, 99
Wind and the Rain, The, 465
Wind of Heaven, The, 465
Winslow Boy, The, 466
 Winter, Keith, 465
Winterset, 449, 481
Winter's Tale, The, 106, 135, 136,
 164
 Wireless, drama of, 451, 452, 453
Wise Woman of Hogsdon, The, 109, 117
Wit and Science, 42, 47
Wit at Several Weapons, 160-161
Wit without Money, 160
Witch, The, 112, 139
Wits, The (collection of drolls), 216
Witty Fair One, The, 165-166
Woman Hater, The, 143, 159
Woman in the Moon, The, 91
Woman is a Weathercock, A, 166
Woman Killed with Kindness, A,
 114, 119, 199, 201-202, 296, 378
Woman of No Importance, A, 386,
 426, 427
Woman's Prize, The, 159
Women Beware Women, 111, 113, 191
Wonder, A New, 164
Word to the Wise, A, 286
 Wordsworth, William (1770-1850), 197, 266, 311, 425; his dramatic
 work, 312
World and the Child, The, 44
World's End, The, 484
Wounds of Civil War, The, 74-75
 Wycherley, William (1640-1715), 162, 243, 261, 279, 467, 469; his dramatic work, 252-254

 $X=O$, 403, 404-405, 490

 YARINGTON, ROBERT, 199
 Yates, Peter, 482
 Yeats, William Butler (1865-1939), 361, 391, 392, 402, 448, 475; his dramatic work, 405-410, 413, 417,
 425, 433
 York mystery cycle, 29-32, 35
Yorkshire Tragedy, A, 198, 297
Young Admiral, The, 141
Young Idea, The, 470
Young Mrs Barrington, 466
Young Woodley, 460
Younger Generation, The, 384-385, 386
 Youth, 49

Zeal of Thy House, The, 482

